Today land has become a matter of major concern to nearly a billion rural people in the world. As population increases, the fierce struggle for land begins, and men vie with each other for plots of land to till. A new milestone is being placed as people in no less than forty different countries are struggling for land reforms.

High on the plateau of Bolivia, two Canadians, Earl C. Merrick and Willard Chandler, heard the cry of the Indians for land. Their mission bought a thousand-acre farm, and some forty families came with it. Most Indians in South America live in a state of serfdom. You buy land, and the seller throws in the serfs.

The thousand acres were divided into small farms. These were then sold to the serf families on long term contract. New homes were built, and the schools began to fill up. There are ten schools in that district now, instead of one, with twenty-six teachers, and 704 pupils. The old serfs, once ripe for revolution but now proud landowners, have become leaders in the community. Young Indians are becoming teachers and church workers.

Let us not get the idea that land reform is new in the world. It dates back to the commission given two thousand years ago — "to preach good news to the poor, to proclaim release to the captives, to set at liberty those who are oppressed."

An Indian student preparing seed-plot for wheat

Since 1920, J. J. De Valois, a graduate in agriculture of Iowa State College, has been pioneering in agricultural improvements at Katpadi, near Vellore, South India. Poultry and milk goats received his early attention, but over the years extension work has been done in improving field and garden crops, and in breeding livestock.

At Katpadi, a diversified farm is now operating at a profit on land once considered hopeless. Mr. De Valois' unique contribution, however, probably lies in the way he has projected the influence of this institution into neighboring villages and beyond. Today, for example, there are three branch poultry farms, and bulls are sent to various villages, for breeding purposes.

He and his Indian colleagues do much work among village youth. Village organizations have been started, and each chooses a project to carry on for at least a year, in agriculture, poultry raising, kitchen gardening, planting papayas, etc.

The outreach of Katpadi goes far. Breeding stock, setting eggs, and day-old chicks are now shipped all over India, and to Burma and Arabia. Mr. De Valois' little manuals on Poultry, on Gardening, and on Milk Goats are widely used.

Over in Mozambique, Africa, is Julian Rea. In that colony, man is "superior." All the woman does is to cook meals, raise the babies, look after the family and do the farm work. Julian's Alma Mater did not teach him to handle a problem like this.

He has a new kind of school spread out over fifteen hundred acres where he educates the whole family at one time. Each family learns to build its own house, to raise its own food according to a new farm plan, and to follow the Christian way of life. The men even raise the cotton, weave cloth, and make clothes for their wives before they complete the three-year course. Each goes back to the village as a trained Christian farmer. Some become teacher-preacher-farmer—all three at the same time. They are the best farmers in their communities. They pass on improved seeds to their neighbors, with the Sunday sermon and the week-day Gospel.

Not only are they self-supporting preachers, but they are demonstrating a better way of life. "Their religion is down to earth," says Rea. "It is also lifting people heavenward."

World service in agriculture

Many young people today would like to help build a better world. They are preparing themselves by study and experience, on our farms, in our rural churches, and in colleges of agriculture and home economics. They realize that the major problems of our times are rural. When we speak of land, seed, food, and shelter, we deal with the hope and fears of nearly half of the people in the world. Peasant people everywhere have come to realize that they need not live in poverty forever. They ask not for luxury nor political power, but for a chance to plow their fields in hope.

To raise the level of living in densely populated areas is a difficult job. We must deal with the basic causes of poverty, which are often spiritual as well as economic. Christ pointed the way to rewarding service among village people when He declared, "He that loses his life shall find it." Agricultural missionaries are getting results as they work with the people in devotion and faith.

Dr. James K. Mathews, chairman of Agricultural Missions, Inc., says: "The years since World War II have been one of the great 'sending periods' for Christian missionaries. Among the thousands who have gone out were a number of agricultural missionaries serving in various lands. Those entirely engaged in this service number 152 at the present time. As encouraging as this response has been, these are not nearly enough. Mission boards are more than ever interested in making it possible for qualified and dedicated young people to find their life's vocation among the world's rural peoples."

New Mission at Painesville, Ohio

Kenneth W. Hollinger

ALONG overdue extension program of the Church of the Brethren in Northeastern Ohio started over a year ago. The District Mission Board had felt that work in a new area should be started and had been endeavoring to find the place in which to begin. After much investigation, about one year ago, the spirit of the Lord seemed to direct to the area near Painesville, Ohio.

The Home Mission Board of the district felt that it was not enough to build a new mission but the leadership that would be in charge of such a new place of work would be just as important as the new mission itself. The moderator of the district was interested in the pioneer work. He counselled and gave encouragement.

As a very fitting climax to the 1954 district meeting, the district accepted the plans and the new challenge. Then the Mission Board had the privilege of announcing that the moderator would be in charge of the work at this new point when it opened up the following summer.

Immediately the Home Mission Board went into action. Many extra meetings were required involving many miles of travel, inasmuch as the Painesville area is about thirty miles east of Cleveland near Lake Erie. This location was many miles from many of the churches and just 200 miles from the church the farthest away in the District.

The Home Mission Board tried to avoid some of the mistakes of past missions. First we purchased about three acres which we figured would give adequate room for church expansion and thus avoid some of the crowded conditions in which some of our former mission churches now find themselves. Next we figured we ought to get the district back of the program and build a respectable plant that would be worshipful and attractive and get away from the forsaken store building mission idea. And last we wanted to go at the program in such a way that progress could be made, people would become interested in it and get it built and going before it was drawn out over a period of years.

Bro. C. H. Deardorff, a pastor in our district met with the board, drew up the plans and got them state and locally approved. Bro. W. D. Shoemaker, a member of our board, and a contractor, supervised the work in an untiring way and brought it to a very satisfactory finish.

When the work was started, a little leaflet was published by the board that told the story and plans of this work. These were printed in sufficient quantities and sent to each church so that every member in the district could have one. Each month the board secretary published a little paper called the NEO-GRAM, which stood for Northeastern Ohio but the word also meant "recent message." This was regularly sent to all pastors, Sunday-school superintendents, mission directors and a few other key persons in each congregation, plus all the members of any district boards. Each NEO-GRAM contained the latest information about the progress on the new mission. Each church was challenged to try to put forth its best effort for this new work either in labor, gifts of material things or gifts of money. Many of the churches responded well.

On November 20, the district had a big day of putting up the chapel and laying the cornerstone. Many people came from all over the district to help and to have a part in this service. It turned out to be a rainy day but much work was accomplished.

During the winter months the plant was completed. This spring the lawn was graded and seeded. The plant consists of a brick veneered parsonage with full basement which can be used for meetings and classrooms. Adjacent to the parsonage study is the frame chapel which will seat approximately 100 people. Back of the pulpit is a baptistry with two small classrooms on either side.

The week following Easter, Bro. and Sister Arthur H. Hess moved into the parsonage and started the work at this new place. They worked in the community and with the people. After Annual Conference, a vacation Bible school was held with over sixty enrollment. This closed with the beginning of public worship services. The worship attendance has averaged nearly fifty already.

On Sunday afternoon, July 17, dedication services were held for this new project with Bro. Edward K. Ziegler as speaker. The place was filled, both chapel and basement of the parsonage, with about 300 people. It was hoped that by dedication time we could have the project completely paid for, but this was not quite realized. There still remains a debt of a few thousand dollars on this plant that is estimated to be worth around $70,000. It was made possible by the co-operation and help of many people in our district. We sought the advice of the regional and Brotherhood offices but thus far the entire money spent has been given by our district.

We hope this project will challenge other districts to go out and do something for church extension. We have thirty-five congregations but until very recently five of these received support from our Home Mission Board of the District. It seems that districts with thirty or more churches ought to be able to start new fields of work in their own districts if they are of a mind to do it and thus let our Brotherhood use funds to help in districts where there is not such strength.

Thus Northeastern Ohio in deep humility presents to the district and our Brotherhood a new mission point at 90 Buckeye Road in the southwest part of Painesville, Ohio. We invite Brethren who are passing through this area of the state to stop in and see this new field of work. It is located at the south end of an already completed new building project and is at the north end of an already ever enlarging building project. It is located in a non-Brethren community, in territory that was not in the bounds of any already existing congregation.

Bearing Witness to the Truth

IF THIS were a "talking" picture it would enable us to listen in on an important conversation. In the center is Kalu, a Nigerian Christian, who is bearing witness to his faith as he talks earnestly with two Mohammedan priests at the Garkida leprosarium. Though he is apparently outnumbered he seems to be adequate to the situation.

As this special foreign missions issue illustrates so well, more and more Nigerian, Indian and Ecuadorian Christians are proving themselves adequate to bear witness to the truth of Jesus Christ, not as some strange deity belonging to strangers from the West but as Lord of all mankind. He says as clearly to these younger churches as he says to us, "You shall be my witnesses"—in Garkida, in Bulsar, in Calderon—"and to the end of the earth."

READERS WRITE . . . to the editor

The Gospel Messenger welcomes letters commenting on editorials, articles and news. Letters should be brief and brotherly.

Self-delusion?

Have we finally arrived at the ultimate in naivete, and self-delusion? Leland Nelson's article in the Aug. 20 issue, on the United Nations' Tenth Birthday, certainly supports this conclusion.

And if the inclusion of the picture of the Festival of Faith "clergymen" is any indication of the quality of our leadership, intellectual as well as spiritual, then I can only exclaim, in the direst desperation, God, in the name of the Christ whom we reject, continue to have mercy upon us. Can't we get, or don't we want, the facts?

"Jesus saith unto him [Thomas], I am the way, the truth, and the life: no man cometh unto the Father but by me" (John 14:6). 2 Cor. 6:14-18, John 10:1-9, and 2 John 1:9-10 are also, "Thus saith the Lord."

Frank E. Nies,
Rocky Ford, Colo.

"They Also Sin"

As a strongly convinced pacifist I feel one of us ought to take exception to the letter by Roy Johnson in the Gospel Messenger for August 13. I have not seen the film "They Also Serve," but I feel deeply that the sin to which pacifists are most vulnerable is that of self-pride. No pacifist should be under any illusion that he is the only one who serves his God, country or church. Every one should take the eternal truth to heart: "All have sinned."

This is not merely theoretical. Thinking pacifists had to wrestle with this problem in World War II when, in a very real sense, they stood idly by while thousands, yes millions of Jews were falling at the hands of execution squads. The pacifist takes on a real burden of guilt in doing this, which can be justified only by God's mercy and a deep, unshakeable faith that it is better for others (not necessarily himself) to suffer, rather than for him to assume God's prerogatives in administering justice, which he fears will turn out to be vengeance. But the guilt is there, and the pacifist needs God's mercy exactly as the militarist does.

The pacifist must not suppose that righteousness indignation should not lead to positive action, even military action for those not thoroughly convinced of pacifism. On the contrary, it would be evil for man to refrain from taking the only steps he knows how to take, against evil. The pacifist differs only in believing that the sum total of evil is more readily reduced by a pacifist course, and that his own integrity is maintained. Not only do "They Also Serve," but They Also Sin.—Delbert Barley, Wynnewood, Pa.

Workers and Unions

This is Labor-Day Sunday and I have just read the article headed "To Those Who Work," on page 15 of the Gospel Messenger dated Sept. 3. Then I turned to the Reader's Digest and reread an article there headed, "Should Labor Unions Have Monopoly Powers?"

This article in the Messenger sounds quite nice and is nicely written. It would sound nicer to me if I knew nothing about labor unions. I would like for the writer of the article to answer some of the questions raised about labor in this article in the Reader's Digest. Or as I might say let him harmonize his article with the one mentioned in Reader's Digest.

After reading this article in Reader's Digest this article in the Messenger sounds "phony."

More Lay Delegates

I have enjoyed your editorials in the Gospel Messenger so much. The one in Sept. 3, "Send More Lay Delegates," has been one of my ideas for years. I hope our church and others will catch the idea. We have many good laymen who deserve the chance to go as delegates but, likely from custom, the pastor and his wife are always considered first. They should have their chance as you suggested, but so should the laity.

I hope your editorial may be read by many and that good will come from it.—A Lay Person.

Real Life Experience

The last Gospel Messenger dated Sept. 3 has an article, "Fifteen Years of Freedom," in it. I wish that article could be put in pamphlet form so it could be distributed. I know of several persons whom I'd like to send it to. A real life experience such as that man relates could do much good if we could get it so that we could send it.—Mrs. Charles Colyn, Lenox, Iowa.

A New Day For Foreign Missions

Paul M. Robinson

ONE of the most significant and far-reaching decisions of the 1955 Annual Conference at Grand Rapids was the approval of a program and strategy for the foreign mission endeavors of the Church of the Brethren in the years to come. This policy for evangelism in the foreign fields, which was submitted by the General Brotherhood Board, is not new in most respects, but is rather the recognition of goals and procedures which have largely been already accepted by the Foreign Missions Commission and the field staff because of changing world conditions.

Many people have been unaware of the fact that the world is undergoing a cultural revolution. Nations that have been considered "backward" for centuries have suddenly discovered their own potential power and are shaking off the shackles of ignorance, indifference and servitude. Changes are coming swiftly in many parts of the world that for centuries have been immune to new ideas. The twin miracles of transportation and communication have literally banished the outposts of civilization and brought the nations into a kind of international neighborhood for which their people have not been socially or psychologically prepared.

All of this changing scene has had tremendous implications for the work of foreign missions. It has forced the church to appraise her world-wide evangelistic work and to re-examine many of the basic assumptions upon which mission work in many areas of the world has been established. The Brotherhood Board cited as one of the principal causes of these changes in mission lands the rise of nationalism and national consciousness. Nations that have been dominated by stronger powers have now thrown off this yoke and are free. Often, even the presence of those from other nations, particularly from the Western world, is regarded as a suspicious carry-over from the days of imperialism and colonialism.

A particularly good example of this is India, where the present government has tended to regard the presence of Christian evangelists as unnecessary and has refused entrance visas to new missionaries when they felt that the work they would do might be carried on by Indian nationals. The economic revolution in many lands, brought about by the introduction of modern scientific methods in agriculture and industry, the rising tides of population with concurrent demands for better standards of living for all people, the growth of materialism which regards life only in terms of physical needs with complete disregard for the importance of the spiritual, racial tensions which have grown out of feelings of superiority on the part of some nations and peoples, and the resurgence of national religions such as Hinduism in India and Islam in Africa, as expressions of the new freedom and national spirit of emerging nations—all these have been regarded as important factors in the world scene which is the inevitable backdrop of the modern missionary movement.

Actually, these disturbing problems need not lead the church to feel that we have come to the twilight of foreign missions. Instead, the church must understand that we have come to a new day for foreign missions which challenges the Christian faith and witness to meet the demands of the present age. We should not in any degree lessen our concern or our endeavor in bringing the gospel to all the world. We must, however, be prepared to look at the needs of the world with open minds and to reassess both our goals in missions and our strategy.

An indigenous church will come about only through the national Christians assuming more and more responsibility for the administration of the program and work of the church. Here a Nigerian is reading clerk for district meeting

Leland S. Brubaker

The General Brotherhood Board, in the paper approved by the Annual Conference, set forth six specific goals for the work of foreign missions today and in the forseeable future. These are exceedingly important and should be considered carefully, for they will determine the future policies of the church in this area of witness.

1. To help nationals establish indigenous churches. This means that the native churches will be encouraged to assume complete financial and administrative responsibility for their own work as rapidly as possible. They will need not only to be self-propagating, self-governing and self-supporting but, also insofar as Christian principles permit, to identify themselves with the culture of their own country. In order to make a more effective testimony in non-Christian lands, they will be encouraged to affiliate with the over-all Protestant church in their respective areas. This means that their ties with the home church will not be so strong, that they will depend less upon American missionary personnel, and that they will be much more free to determine their own policies.

2. To place responsibility in the hands of the national Christians. In order to make the churches in mission lands more completely indigenous, it will

Missions and World Communion Sunday

Guest Editorial by V. F. Schwalm

I WAS surprised, while attending a great religious conference about a year ago, to learn that the churches of Southeast Asia had a missionary secretary in the person of Rajah B. Manikan, who represented the International Missionary Council and the World Council of Churches. His assignment was to work, as a missionary secretary, among the Christian Councils of Asia.

Between 1951 and 1954 he had visited the churches of Singapore, Indonesia, Greece, Yugoslavia, India, Hongkong, Japan, Korea, Formosa, Burma, Thailand, Indochina, Malaya, Pakistan, Ceylon, Australia, New Zealand, Fiji and Hawaii.

These are the lands where mission churches exist. I had never stopped to think that these younger churches were now becoming "mother" churches to other churches and thus were helping in the great task of evangelizing the world.

It sounded quite familiar to hear Rev. Manikan say that "two great convictions had grown in us. (1) We Christians in East Asia should give far more to the church than we are doing now. . . . (2) The other conviction of ours is that the time has come when we of East Asia should regard the evangelization of this part of the world as our primary responsibility. Our sons and daughters should be challenged to go out as missionaries. We rejoice that some of ours have already answered such a call, but we need to send out more, and support them better, in obedience to our Lord's Great Commission."

As one's mind dwells on these facts, he is impressed with the international character of the Christian church. We have been accustomed to think of some European countries and parts of North America sending out missionaries to non-Christian lands. But to most of us it has not occurred that so-called "mission churches" who have received the blessings of the gospel, in turn feel an obligation to "send the light" on to yet others.

Surely the hymn writer was right who wrote, "In Christ there is no East or West, . . . but one great fellowship of love."

It is indeed a thrilling experience to sit in a great international gathering, where white, black, yellow, brown and red races mingle freely and regard one another with utmost respect; where men of every race and nation can sing feelingly, "Blest be the tie that binds our hearts in Christian love."

On this World Communion Sunday, it is thrilling to know that the gospel has girdled the globe and that even behind the iron curtain there are thousands who have not forsaken their allegiance to Christ. There are indeed many who have suffered great persecution and even death, because of their Christian faith.

But, alas, we have been tardy. We have come to these countries too late and with too few missionaries, and sometimes we did not come in the right spirit. Only one or two and, at most three, out of every hundred of the population are Christians in many Asiatic countries. Indeed, we may say, "The Messenger of God cometh late."

There are few peacemaking organizations that reach around the world. The Christian church is one of these. We ought never to rest at ease in Zion until we have done our utmost through our missionaries and service agencies to strengthen the Christian impact at home and around the world.

Let us then, on this World Communion Sunday, pray for the Christians in the younger churches around the world and for our own churches, that we may hold high, here and abroad, the light of the gospel of Christ.

A Note About Special Mission Issues

FOR A number of years the Gospel Messenger has assigned special issues to each of our major foreign mission fields. These annual issues were given to presenting the work in India, Africa and China and, more recently, in Ecuador.

This particular issue, coming on World Communion Sunday, has been planned in a different manner. There is a lead article by the chairman of the Foreign Mission Commission concerning the new policy statement adopted by the Grand Rapids Conference. There are general articles from each of the three fields, discussing issues of vital concern to the younger churches in which we are most interested. In adition, there are concise news reports from each of the fields, giving up-to-date information of new developments, progress reports from the churches and news concerning missionaries.

We hope that two or three special issues like this one each year, along with the regular news from the foreign field in each week's paper, will help all our readers to feel their spiritual kinship with their brothers in Nigeria, India, Ecuador—or wherever Christ is honored around the world. —K.M.

Protestantism in Latin America

Benton Rhoades

L. S. Brubaker

Protestant influence in Latin America is measured not only by figures but by the educational institutions for training Protestant leaders, the hospitals and clinics, church periodicals, the continent-wide campaign against illiteracy and the awakening of the Catholic Church to good works

Shrines like these are common along the roadsides of Latin America and point to the dominance of the Roman Catholic Church in the countries of that area

IT WOULD seem well that any kind of report on non-Roman Christianity in Latin America should begin with a definition of terms. Protestants from the Rio Grande south are generally referred to as (evangelicos). This latter term is more than a fortunate translation into Spanish. It is a high tribute to the positiveness of the early Protestant missionaries who came to these countries. The word Protestant (Protestante) is rarely heard in Latin America except from the Roman Catholic priests and then is usually spoken through the teeth.

Latin Americans make a distinction between religion and faith in Christ. One missionary in Chile, when he requested entrance to an army barracks, was asked what he wished to talk about there. He said, "About Jesus Christ." "All right," was the reply, "as long as you do not talk about religion you can go ahead." Protestantism's task in Latin America is not to exchange one ecclesiastical loyalty for another. It is to present Christ as a Savior and Christianity as a way of life. Protestantism without this evangelical emphasis would have little to offer the people in the Latin American countries.

Is There a Need?

First, in order to understand the reason for Protestant Christianity here, one must realize that there is a tremendous difference between Roman Catholicism of the United States and Northern Europe on the one hand and that of Latin America, Spain and Italy on the other. Here we have Roman Catholicism operating upon basically Catholic concepts. Roman Catholics have a perfect right to hold to these concepts, but it is our duty to know them. Every good Roman Catholic believes that his is the only true faith and that it should and must exist to the exclusion of all others. He believes that the church and the state should be united, with the church in supremacy and the state serving it. He believes that the church not only can but must make all moral, ethical and spiritual decisions for its members, that an individual's personal knowledge of Christ is not a sufficient basis either for salvation or for Christian conduct. In such a church an acquaintance with the Scriptures is not only unnecessary but actually disrupting and embarrassing. The Bible has traditionally been a prohibited book in Latin America. The people of the United States have not seen true Roman Catholicism—yet. Roman Catholicism has had success in Latin America as judged by Catholic standards.

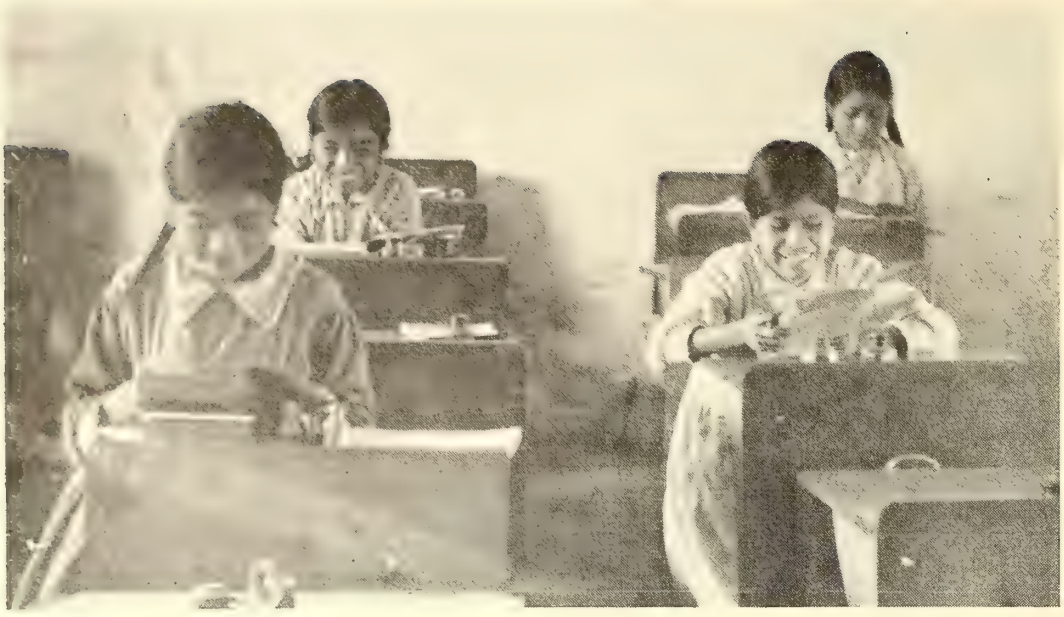
There has been a religious monopoly in Latin America which, in things of the spirit as in things material, brings unhappy results. A. J. Cronin in Keys of the Kingdom puts it this way, "Individualism is a rather dangerous quality in a theologian," Father Farrant remarks acidly, "It gave us the Reformation."

"And the Reformation gave us a better behaved Catholic Church." answers Father McNabb. The Reformation has been late in reaching these shores. But it is as much needed here now as it was in Europe of the fifteenth century and in the time of Jesus who also lived and preached within a priest-ridden society.

How the Movement Got Started

Freedom from Spain at the beginning of the nineteenth century brought with it a wave of liberalism. The great liberators, like Bolívar and San Martín, were liberal-minded men who believed in freedom of conscience. The Roman Catholic Church had opposed the struggle for independence from Spain, largely because the church and state were so closely knit together but also because of its authoritarian principles.

So it was natural that, with this new birth of freedom in Latin America, doors should be opened to fresh winds of thought and spiritual influence for the first time.



James Thompson, agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society and himself a competent educator, landed in Buenos Aires with his boxes of Testaments soon after Argentina had won its freedom. His educational projects gained acclaim and he was asked to organize the school system in Argentina. Soon after he was invited by the government of Uraguay to do the same there. General O'Higgins, the Chilean patriot, not only invited him to come to Chile but also paid his traveling expenses. In the Thompson schools, the Bible, which was formerly prohibited, was used as a textbook for instruction in reading. In 1822, he went to Peru. There the liberator San Martín turned the friars out of a convent in order that Thompson might set up his school. Thompson did not leave behind him organized churches or baptized believers. But as he went up and down South America selling and teaching the Bible, he sowed seed which even now is being harvested.

James Thompson was not the only missionary active in these early days of the Protestant movement in Latin America.

Those Latin Americans who go to Protestant churches and schools and who become Protestants face the intolerance of the Catholic majority and possible persecution

Faye Koontz

One of Protestantism's important contributions to Latin America has been mass education

Faye Koontz

They were many and their names are well-known in the history of missions. But his work does symbolize two of Protestantism's important contributions to these countries, mass education and the Bible.

The Problems of Protestantism

By the end of the nineteenth century Protestant missions had their representatives in every country of Latin America. But the Roman Catholic hierarchy by that time had also accommodated itself to the new republican status of the various countries and was squaring away to make war on the young Protestant movement. Various methods of warfare were used ranging from boycott of national believers to actual killings of Protestant families—from cutting off food supplies of missionaries to political action limiting their entrance into certain countries.

Mission boards came awake to the great unevangelized areas and began to send out workers. Mission staffs were loaded with technicians, agriculturists, doctors, nurses, radio technicians, teachers, pilots—of the best that the church in North America and Europe could offer. But there were many wrecks along the road that they traveled. Mr. Kenneth Grubb, in a survey made for the Missionary Fellowship of Central and South America, reports the highest withdrawal rate of missionaries of any major mission fields of the world. The principal cause he suggests to be functional nervous disorders. Doubtless no small part of these breaks can be traced to the constant war of hate incited by the priests against the missionary, especially among the people of the small communities.

Another difficulty in the movement is that in many places there has been little concept of the church. Is it not sufficient here and possible anywhere that men should be gathered one by one and brought into a personal relationship with Christ? This argument is attractive to the extreme individualism of the Latin American who has recently come out from Roman Catholic authoritarianism. Unfortunately, it has been the attitude also of certain large missionary groups. But where the existing religious system is as much a social pattern as it is a church, the saved must be given opportunity to practice his new faith in fellowship with other persons of kindred mind. Missionaries coming to Latin America without an adequate concept of the church have left much to be desired in their ministries and in the teaching of national evangelical leaders.

Current Status of the Movement

In spite of many problems, the movement has grown. Ten years ago the total Protestant community in Latin America was reckoned at 2,000,000 and the growth in the ten years since has been greater than in any other earlier period. The country of Brazil alone is estimated to have the above number of Protestants today. But membership figures do not tell the whole story of Protestant influence in these countries.

In 1942 Dr. George Howard found 52 theological colleges and Bible institutes training ministers in Latin America, 60 hospitals and clinics caring for the sick and carrying on public health programs, 155 church papers and periodicals being published, 152 Protestant secondary schools and many elementary schools. These services are on the increase. The present continent-wide campaign against illiteracy, inaugurated by the Protestant church is now enthusiastically supported by South American governments. In many of the countries mission farms carry on programs of agricultural extension either on their own or in collaboration with other technical aid programs. Some 35,000,000 Scriptures have been sold.

The Catholic Church has awakened and has been either forced or encouraged to good works. Support to its service orders has increased. The Bible is no longer prohibited for Catholics to read. A single example is that the great Indian community, where the Church of the Brethren mission is located and which passed unnoticed by the church during all these many years, within this past year has received a Catholic parochial school, construction is now beginning on a training convent, and promise is circulated of the first Catholic rural normal school in Ecuador to be placed in this community. Only a few weeks ago a leaflet was distributed here in this community notifying the people that the Bible is no longer prohibited reading material — with the caution, however, that it be a Catholic version (price four times that of the Protestant version) and that interpretation be sought from the priest.

Present-day Persecution of Protestants

Intolerance is on the increase again. At the same time that Roman Catholicism in North America pleads for the union of all Christians against communism, crimes are carried on against Protestants in Latin America in the name of religion that look dreadfully like the methods of our supposed common enemy. The archbishop of Mexico states, "With Christian serenity, but also with great energy, we shall oppose the expansion of the Protestant campaign. More than that, we shall fight it until we destroy it." If this pronouncement comes out of one of the most liberal countries of Latin America, one is left with no doubt what must be the fighting orders for the more conservative countries like Colombia and Ecuador.

The Vatican is making a desperate last stand at supremacy over the state and at stamping out the evangelical Christian faith in these lands. In spite of tight censorship in Colombia reports leak out that twenty-five chapels have been burned, five confiscated and eight bombed. In many villages and small towns in Colombia houses are boarded up like those of a ghost mining town, people having fled in fear of their lives from fanatical vandals who roam the country attacking all but those faithful to the Roman Catholic Church. It is hard to say how many have been martyred. We believe that only through the providence of God and the slip-up in the last national elections has Ecuador been spared this in the past three years. But it seems to be coming. Five attacks against national believers or missionaries in Ecuador have been registered in the past two months.

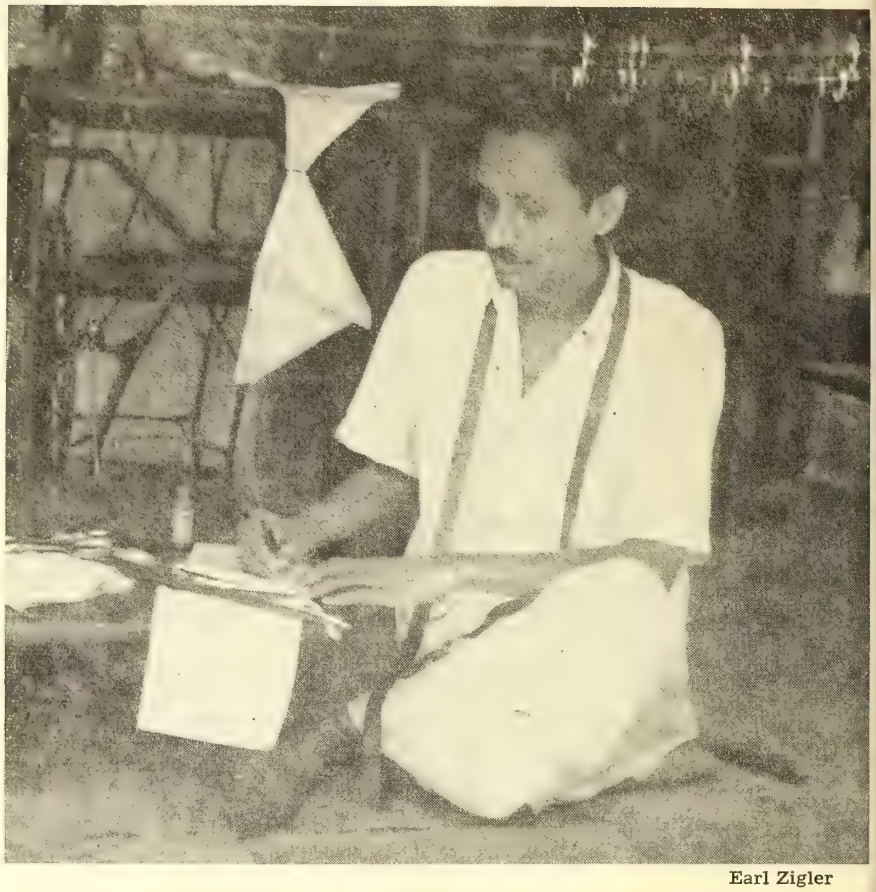
We praise God for the serenity of our national brethren under fire and believe that, if the church is truly a New Testament one, it shall come through persecution, not defeated, but purified and with a greater testimony than ever before.

"Do Not Know" or "Cannot Tell"

Luther A. Weigle

THE King James Version of the New Testament translates the Greek verb oida by the English verb know 280 times. But there is a little group of exceptions to this general practice. Nine times it translates oida, accompanied with a negative, by "cannot tell."

Three of these passages are Matthew 21:27, Mark 11:33, Luke 20:7, the answer of the Pharisees to Jesus' question concerning the baptism of John. Three are in the Gospel of John: 3:8, addressed to Nicodemus; 8:14, addressed to the Pharisees; 16:18, the puzzled comment of the disciples, "We cannot tell what he saith." Three are in 2 Cor. 12:2-3, Paul's statement concerning his visions and revelations.



These nine cases of "cannot tell" come from the translation by William Tyndale, and appear also in Coverdale, Thomas Matthew, the Great Bible, the Geneva Bible and the Bishops' Bible. They are examples of Tyndale's lively and occasionally wayward style. He uses the expression elsewhere — three times in the account of the man born blind (John 9:21, 25), who answers: "Whether he be a sinner or no, I cannot tell; one thing I am sure of, that I was blind, and now I see." Tyndale's version of Mary Magdalene's excited word to Peter and John is (John 20:2): "They have taken away the Lord out of the tomb, and we cannot tell where they have laid him." In 1 John 2:11 Tyndale had "cannot tell whither he goeth."

Thus out of fourteen cases where Tyndale and the other sixteenth-century translators from the Greek used "cannot tell" for "do not know," the King James translators kept nine and rejected five.

Modern translators, beginning with the English Revised Version of 1881, have rejected "cannot tell" in all these cases (except that J. B. Phillips uses "I couldn't tell" in John 9:25). The reason is not so much that the expression is wrong, as that it is inaccurate and ambiguous. "Do not know" is a clear and accurate translation.

Becoming Good Christian Stewards

P. G. Bhagat and Earl M. Zigler

Earl Zigler

A Christian tailor makes "the Lord's bag" for the tithes given by the Bulsar brethren

ONE evening some of the church leaders in the village of Bamanvel sat down to evaluate their degree of stewardship. The church had incurred a debt of about $450 on their church building. It appeared to be an insurmountable burden to this group of low-income people and some were becoming hopeless. Then they got a new glimpse of their possibilities. A survey of their income showed them that if all gave the tithe their debt could not only be wiped out in one year, but they could still have more to spend on their regular church program than they had spent the year before. They took an honest look at the promises of God through the prophet Malachi (Mal. 3:7-10) and at Christ's challenge, "Seek first his kingdom." There followed testimonies of repentance for having neglected their stewardship and the church decided to give all its members an opportunity to take a bag (the Lord's Bag) furnished by the church, into which a tenth of all income would be set aside for the church. At certain intervals these will be brought to the church and poured out before the Lord.

Other Experiences in Stewardship

Efforts, however, have been made for the last several years to arouse interest in the heart of church members to become good Christian stewards. The result is promising in both the Gujarati and the Marathi districts. One need not be wealthy to be a good steward of Christ. In fact the obligation to be one falls equally on wealthy and poor. Both ten-talent and one-talent persons have equal responsibility to render accounts. The following examples will show how it is being tried.

Some two years back it was decided by the officers of the church at Anklesvar that our church should be self-supporting within three years. The recommendation was passed by the annual meeting of the church, and since then members are giving more and more towards the church work. A tithe offering is being taken every three months regularly, and is used only for the support of the pastor.

Bulsar church has emphasized tithing for a number of years and has become the first really self-supporting congregation of the Brethren in India.

By the efforts of Bro. A. F. Bollinger the Lord's Acre plan is being put into practice at Jitaly. This is a village church in the Anklesvar area. It was rather hard for these people to understand the importance and value of this project, but with sincere and continuous effort they began to take interest. The farming is being done on a co-operative and free labor basis. It was, however, necessary to pay some poor people when they asked for it. In 1954-55 the income of the farm was approximately $175, which was given to the church.

Both the Vali and Amletha churches are farming land on a co-operative basis, giving all proceeds to the church. The Vali church had to give some money for weeding the fields, but the planting and cultivation are being done by donated labor.

In some areas in Rajpipla, emphasis is being put on giving with the suggestion that each member should give R.1 (25c) per month. In cases where this is likely to work too much hardship, then R.1 per family. This will create a habit to give regularly.

More emphasis is being put on thanksgiving in the Netrang church area. In one of the services one member offered Rs.100 ($25). The churches in Khergam and the Vyara area hold thanksgiving festivals regularly, when people gladly bring their grain, vegetables, eggs, etc. Some people bring money also.

Dahanu church has a good record of giving. This is partly because of a carefully worked-out plan of some fourteen points which was adopted by the church as early as 1935. In addition to regular features of Sunday-school offerings, etc., there is the monthly offering for those on monthly wage, special offerings at weddings, graduation day, etc. Then the annual thanksgiving day is always a highlight in Dahanu church year. Fruits and crops of the land, things made by the women and girls, and other gifts in kind are brought. They are dedicated in a fitting service and afterwards auctioned off in the church.

On July 27, 1928, fourteen men from Ahwa formed the Ahwa Christian Laymen's Movement. Their definite project was a rice field. The signboard near the field reads, "This Field is Dedicated to the Lord." Ever since, the rice harvested each year has been presented to the church and sold during the annual harvest festival. The special harvest offering is an annual festival; money, grain, chickens, etc, are brought on this day and dedicated to the Lord. Usually from one hundred to two hundred rupees are raised annually for the church this way.

District Bodies Take Action

At their meeting last winter the Gujarati elders decided to take action on the matter of stewardship education. The Elders' Commission was asked to arrange for and promote the project. One step taken by the body was to promote the movement of Fellowship of Tithers and by this means win as many individuals as possible to that great fellowship. Another thing they are doing is working out a program for all local churches on the subject and preparing materials in Gujarati for their use. From the vast amount of stewardship materials available in English, those which are most adaptable to our conditions here are being translated. These materials are to be sent to each church as they are prepared.

The Marathi district meeting last year made a decision to organize the Fellowship of Proportionate Givers. This movement is based on the principle of 1 Cor. 16:2. The main object of this movement is to cultivate a habit of systematic giving through setting apart a definite portion of one's income. Of course tithing is the ideal and by this way we want to achieve the desired goal. Cards are being printed for distribution among the members. The card reads: "I pledge, keeping in mind that I am the Lord's steward, to give—part every month regularly and cheerfully for the

Ivan Eikenberry

Nigerian Christian leaders are needed to win the confidence and trust of the older men who are the leaders of Nigerian village life

THE moderator of the district stepped forward. Madu Mshelia and wife heard their charges. He knelt. The hands of three elders were laid upon him. But the hand of God was heaviest. He arose, the third ordained Nigerian minister of the Church of the Brethren. He took the Nigerian hands, promising co-operation and support.

Mourning for the wife and mother had continued for two weeks. Friends and relatives met to conclude the mourning. It is an ancient tradition, and good, but pagan. Madu, so recently ordained, led in Christian worship and skillfully related it to their and his own tradition, interpreting the added meaning and comfort which Christians find through Christ Jesus.

He is Nigerian. Their background is his. They share a hope and faith. But his knowledge of the way exceeds theirs. He is one of seven ministers trained in the Chibuk class. There the gospel was opened by the Holy Spirit. The spiritual meanings and the practice of Christ-centered living were explored deeply. Nigerians give him leadership opportunities because of his training.

He is mature. Nigerians, even older men, accept his leadership. He was selected for ministerial training because he was mature.

But he can fill one place. Who is to fill the dozens of newly opening preaching points, seeds of new congregations? At Kogu we met for the first local baptism. Twenty-four were baptized. Earlier ten others had made their first public confession of Jesus Christ as Savior. One of those baptized was the local teacher, the lay evangelist who had led the others to Christ. He is one of the important men in government-approved Classes of Religious Instruction. They are important because among the young generation tribal paganism has become the unpopular symbol of backwardness and progress is almost the fetish of Nigerian youth. There are two choices open to them: Mohammedanism, the religion of most of the men in local and central government in Northern Nigeria, and Christianity, represented by our lay evangelist. He is young, he is untrained, he is inexperienced but he has Christ, and him he shares.

To share Christ is enough to lead men to accept Christ. But when one begins from a pagan background, in Christianity, a completely strange, foreign religion, one needs a teacher. Even this newly baptized teacher himself needs a teacher to lead him and to interpret for him the spiritual—the things of the heart—for he and his people have previous knowledge only of religions which make one's act all important and ignore one's heart.

To meet the need of now, the Nigerian Church has planned for a Bible School to give a supply of lay evangelists and pastors who are better able to live and present Christianity. Proved Christian zeal and a good degree of literacy are the only prerequisites. Each man will support himself in school as much as possible. The congregations will complete the personal needs. The mission will supply teachers, buildings and medical care.

At Kogu there were no old men to come into the church. Young men and women, following a boy teacher. At Dzonggola we sat with the young men who make up the newborn church there and talked long with old, gray Ali. Ali concluded as he began, "The way of Jesus is the only way, but I am lost; for I am old and this is a young man's way." Yet, outside the church, the older men are the recognized natural leaders of the people. Therefore, we often have two sets of leaders, young and old, religious and village. But the village leaders are often religious leaders, also, in the ancient tribal paganism. So we must say Christian and non-Christian. The Christian has, in addition to the power of the Holy Spirit, the apparent power of leader in a new era of progress and youth revolt. The non-Christian has the power of tradition and fear and position. To foster development of a church and a Christian community, both leaders must unite or at least co-operate. The future of the church depends upon leaders who can make the two groups of leaders into one group or, at least, Christian and pro-Christian.

To develop men to serve as lay pastors to the Christians and yet to have open hearts of love which attract friendship and trust of others is, therefore, a major responsibility in training teachers at Waka, which is the Church of the Brethren teachers' college in Nigeria. Educational standards are set by the government, teachers' certificates are granted by the government but with complete religious freedom the training is the church's. The opportunity of the present teacher need is the church's. The government will pay the teachers in approved schools, but the teachers serve the church. Through Bible study, through classes in Christian living, Christian leadership and preaching, through practical Christian witness in surrounding villages, and through influence of a Christian faculty and a Christian student community, Waka aims to train Christian leaders who are the best educated men, in religion and in general knowledge, of all in their villages, men in the Brethren tradition of the free ministry.

Women must be trained in living with other tribes and in working outside woman's traditional duties so that they can be ready to share in the opportunities offered in the location of their husbands

But humility and common-sense-village psychology are important, as is absolute moral integrity, if these men are to serve within the church and reach those still outside. Such a spirit is not easily developed or maintained by a youth aware of his educational achievement and aware that his salary is among the highest in the village. Especially is it difficult in a society which considers attainment of recognized leadership, even in a small way, as the supreme accomplishment of life. Humility does not thrive in such an atmosphere and even the strength of Christian conviction is tried.

In a newly developing nation there are so many job opportunities. There are so many things to be had, for a price. The temptation is to think that the price of these things can be had from employment outside the church, but all of these are away from home—government departments, public institutions, the police and even the army. We are tempted to count the number who leave as the number lost, but they are not lost nor are they losses. The visiting army captain (son of missionaries) sipped tea at Waka and told of Christian activity at the army base and said, "The best sermon I've heard in a long time, your man (a former student, now a corporal) preached last Sunday. He's a strong Christian influence." Another is the only Christian Nigerian teacher in a school of Muslim children. Another is a nurse in a government hospital in a Muslim city, and others, sons of the church.

Leaders must rise and leaders will exert influence. Laws can demand freedom of religion, but they cannot eliminate a leader's conscious and unconscious influence for his own religion. The Nigerian Church must contribute Christian blood to the new nation and it now has opportunities to do so. But that places a double burden. At a time when the church itself is critically short of educated leaders, she must also supply Christian leadership for secular development.

Because of the deep suspicion of immorality in all contacts between men and women, a man is often able to have very little chance to influence directly or to teach the women. Women need women teachers. In the Teachers' College at Waka, the thirty-nine wives of teacher trainees attend regular women's school, with much emphasis upon Christianity and domestic science. To learn to live with other tribes and to learn to work outside woman's traditional duties are difficult but important lessons if the wife is to be ready to share in the village opportunity of her husband's location. The newly opened girls' junior high school at Waka is training wives for unmarried Christian men who want Christian homes.

Pioneering Brethren once again move out from village to new village, from valley to new valley, once again playing a part in the development of a new nation, the nation of Nigeria. Facing many problems similar to those faced by their church ancestors in the United States, they are trying similar methods and they must have like faith and conviction of purpose, called in Christ Jesus. But there is a great difference.

Nigerian Brethren must do their pioneering in an entrenched society, which defies remolding, not in an uprooted society seeking to be reformed; and under governments, local and central, almost entirely of an anti-Christian religion which might be termed the unofficial state religion; and with people of very low income, often only one step away from subsistence living or still in it. Theirs is a more difficult task than was our fathers'.

As the original pioneering Brethren moved into a new valley and then sent to call a leader from some established community, so Nigerian Brethren are now exerting themselves, pushing their witness out to claim new areas, and they are calling to the established churches in America for leaders to train leaders.

A New Day for Missions

be necessary to give special emphasis to the training of native leaders in the next few years. The work of American missionaries will become more administrative, helping to supervise the work which will be done largely by native Christians. Native churches not only must be encouraged to assume more and more financial responsibility for their own program, but will be given greater administrative control over funds appropriated to their mission by the church in America.

3. To seek new ways to strengthen the national churches. Mission churches may soon no longer be regarded as simply a branch of the American church. They will probably keep a close relationship with the home church, at least for the next several years, but will be increasingly regarded as a real member of the body of Christ, bringing the insights of their own heritage and culture into their Christian experience.

4. To train national leaders. The problem of securing adequate and trained leadership for churches in mission lands is at the heart of strategy for the future. Much of the missionary activity in the next few years must be in this direction. Nationals must replace foreign missionaries in every possible task. Some of this training must be given in co-operation with other Christian bodies. Bringing students to America does not completely answer this need, because they are separated too long from their own culture and are likely to absorb Western ways which are not acceptable to their own people.

5. To select missionaries carefully. Not only must missionary personnel be carefully trained as specialists in their respective fields, but they must have a wholesome attitude toward people of other races and be willing to work side by side with national workers as co-laborers with equal status. It seems quite desirable to endeavor to internationalize the mission staff, so that not all foreign workers on any field will be coming from America.

6. To increase the sense of oneness of the Christian church. The emphasis in missionary endeavor must increasingly be centered upon Christ and his church universal instead of upon denominationalism. Christians in the younger churches find it difficult to understand denominational rivalries, which should certainly not be transplanted into mission lands. Rather, Christians in every land should come more and more to be regarded as one great fellowship of Christ throughout the whole wide earth. While missionaries of the Church of the Brethren are certainly going to carry the Brethren interpretation of the New Testament to mission lands, they will be more interested in turning men to Christ as Lord and Savior, and establishing his church universal, than making converts for the Church of the Brethren. The Annual Conference paper has stated this aim so clearly. "We are engaged, along with other Christian bodies, in a mission to convince the world that Jesus Christ is Lord; we are moving across all frontiers where he is not so recognized."

In all the world's turmoil and unrest, men are searching for a way of life that will satisfy their hearts' deepest desires. The Christian church must declare in such a time as always, "Christ is the answer!" This is no moment for retreat in foreign missions. It is rather a time for a new understanding of the needs of man and a rededication to the unfinished task of bringing Christ to every heart. The witness of the church is more important than any method that has been or ever may be used. May the Church of the Brethren face courageously the new day in foreign missions, with its responsibilities and opportunities and move forward in faith to serve the present age, until "the kingdoms of this world become the kingdom of our Lord, and of his Christ."

growth of the kingdom of God and edification of the church." We are eagerly waiting to see the result of this movement. It is our hope that many of our members will join in this fellowship willingly.

Our total effort, however, is not adequate but we are moving slowly in the right direction. The present situation of India somehow or other forces us to concentrate our minds and souls on this very important matter of Christian stewardship. We are of the opinion that until and unless a great many of our brethren become tithers there is no hope for a self-supporting church in India. We earnestly pray that God may help us all become Christian stewards.

The Family Counselor

Naomi Will H. K. Zeller, Jr. Jesse Ziegler

The Family Counselor welcomes letters of inquiry. They may be addressed: Family Life Department, General Brotherhood Board, 22 S. State St., Elgin, Ill.

Dear Counselor,

My family tells me that I am a victim of my moods. Most of the time I love my husband and my children, the housework seems a sizable load, the neighbors are all right, and it's generally a good world to be in. But every once in a while I go into sort of a tailspin—and then all these things are just in reverse. My husband's little faults are mountains, our children do not measure up to other people's children, and washing the dishes and making the beds seems one endless monotonous chore. Even my best neighbors get on my nerves; I find myself wishing we lived somewhere else. At such times I get very blue—even to the point of wanting to take my life; at times I have wondered if I might actually lose my mind. If I really knew that it is only a mood that would pass, I could manage to struggle through but I am writing you in the midst of one of these and I assure you my troubles seem very real.

One Who Wants to Stay on Top!

Dear Friend,

In your present state I am not sure that it will do any good for anyone to tell you that this trough of despair will pass and that things will look different. And yet this is assuredly true. One of the things about emotional difficulties that is almost 100% certain is that a "low" mood will give way in a day, a week or a month or more to a quite different emotional state.

I scarcely know what is best to say to you about these recurring difficulties of yours. Perhaps I should say a word about why they come, what to do, where to get help.

Depressive states such as you now feel probably come from two sources. There may be a temporary glandular imbalance which "throws" you. But another factor may usually be present in causing depressive states. If a person feels resentment toward someone upon whom he is dependent for love and security, then the resentment is probably not expressed toward such a person. Instead it is turned inward upon himself. He then feels himself to be worthless, things look bad and he feels like hurting himself.

You can probably help these recurring states if you can anticipate about when one is due. Then say to your husband, "I'll be tempted to be 'low' in the next day or two. Talk to me and help me to come through it." Dr. Maeder of Switzerland says that sometimes a determination to "shrug the burden off one's shoulders like dropping a a heavy load" and to continue with one's work is very helpful. He also insists that even a simple religious faith helps a person to move through a depressive state. It is certainly good hygiene to follow the practice of talking out one's disagreements with those who are close to you. Bottling up one's feelings only serves the purpose of turning them in on ourselves and moves toward depressive states.

I would like to urge that when you get into a period when nothing looks good and life doesn't seem worth living you talk not only with your pastor, but also go to a competent psychiatrist and talk with him about your feelings. Sometimes he will be able to use treatment that will help you very quickly. He may also over a period of several interviews discover underlying causes for your depression. Your family doctor may be able to provide help for any glandular imbalance that results in periodic upsets from this cause. Talk to him about your problem.

News From Our Mission World

India—Today

IN MID-AUGUST, India celebrated her Independence Day. Eight years have passed since the memorable day of August 15, 1947. The government's first five-year plan produced real progress in many ways—land reform, housing schemes, roads, schools, hospitals, irrigation projects, factories, cottage industries, rehabilitation of displaced persons and credit societies. And now the second five-year plan is under way with goals that will spell advancement in many more fields of endeavor for the welfare of the country. Prohibition has proved a blessing to many poor villagers where it has been enforced by Madras and Bombay States. The Bhoodan (gift of land) Movement led by Gandhi's loved disciple, Vinoba Bhave, is gaining momentum toward its goal of fifty million acres of land to be redistributed to village people who own no land.

Inspiring all this creative planning is Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru, beloved abroad as well as at home. His recent trip to Russia and Europe broke down barriers and paved the way for the success of the Geneva Conference with its growing foundation for mutual understanding and peace.

India today is facing some very grave problems. Central government desires to settle by peaceful means the matter of Goa and a few smaller units on the west coast of India, still held by Portugal, that wish to become a part of independent India. There are many demonstrations by the local people in these units expressing their desire to join up with India. Recent firing upon crowds, resulting in the death of several satyagrahis or demonstrators by peaceful means, has aggravated the problem to a serious degree. Acutely heart-rending is the problem now with the monsoon floods affecting large areas of northern and northeastern India, while at the same time other areas where the monsoon has failed to come now face famine from drought. Wide-scale, over-all planning is needed to meet these serious conditions. Funds for relief and rehabilitation are being raised to help the victims in these areas.

Fortunately, the Church of the Brethren mission area in Western India has not been too severely affected by either the floods or the drought.

Bombay

Starting in Bombay let us visit our various stations and get a picture of the high points in recent months. Edith McDowell finds plenty to do in running "Rajmahal" as a boarding house for a constant flow of missionaries coming and going through Bombay. The Inter-Mission Business Office where Kenneth McDowell is our mission representative, cares for a volume of routine office work that is a contribution to the mission enterprise as a whole in India.

Palghar

Stopping at Palghar, fifty miles north of Bombay, we see a boarding school going on well. Quoting from Andrew Holderreed's report we note, "The hostels are full with fifty-three boys and girls. This figure includes eight high school boys living here and attending school in town. The enrollment in our school is good this year, having reached 120.

"Anticipating the extra work involved in the seven new rice fields laid out this year, we planted rice the last week of May and irrigated it with the windmill. This gave us a tremendous advantage, as we were ready to set plants when the first rains came. However, as the rains were light, we soon had to wait for more rain as there was not enough mud in the fields for transplanting. Two fields we put in by stripping the little Maytag engine off our washing machine, belting it to a small pump, and lifting water out of the ditch by the roadside. Finally, and very late, the rains set in and gave us enough to plant all the fields. At this writing the outlook is good for an abundant harvest.

"Now that the rice is planted, the boys turn to shopwork. This is not required by government, but we have taught a bit of carpentry for years. So the boys are making model farm equipment, learning to make simple joints, and handles for sickles and other implements. Some of the larger boys work on making chairs and larger projects."

Dahanu Road

Going on about twenty-five miles we arrive at Dahanu, where the Dr. Cunninghams, C. G. Shulls and Nurse Olive Wise live. Dahanu church was especially happy over its vacation Bible school during the first two weeks of May. Four classes assembled each morning from 8 to 10:30, while the youth attended a class at night. This class, taught by Chalmer Shull, studied the subject of money with respect to right and wrong methods of acquiring, spending, saving and giving. The average attendance in the youth class was thirty-one while the average for the entire school was eighty-five. The whole church was strengthened through this school.

Recently Bro. Shull attended a meeting of the Evangelistic Committee of the Regional Christian Council. On Oct. 25 there will begin in Nasik a very large and well-attended Hindu religious fair, which will continue for several months. The committee on evangelism is planning for a united evangelistic effort at this fair. There will be a large number of churches participating through financial support, personnel and prayer—these churches being the fruitage of work previously done by missions from England, Australia and the United States. The prayers of the churches in all of these lands are solicited for the united effort of the churches in the Marathi region of West India.

The search for a qualified Indian doctor to shoulder the responsibility of the medical work at Dahanu continues. Meanwhile, for the past two months Dr. Cunningham has been sacrificially pinch-hitting. Both doctors and staff have been very busy. Three nurses will appear for the government midwifery examination the latter part of August. Four others have almost completed their first year of training.

Bulsar

Next we stop at Bulsar, 120 miles from Bombay, where the Dr. Hoovers, the Wendell Florys and Nurse Louise Sayre live. We have asked Wendell Flory for a report of recent events in the area.

"The work of our evangelistic centers is getting off to a slow start and two centers, Velvach and Enjlalav, have not opened at all because of lack of money for housing facilities. The churches are just now somewhat getting their breath again after the government took away the schools a year ago. Two weeks ago the Bulsar church started a morning Bible class for school children and about twenty are attending. It meets at 7:30 a.m. Then at 8:00 a.m., for two hours each morning, we have a kindergarten class for preschool children, with about forty in attendance.

"The Bhat church has daily evening Bible teaching for all the members. The church in Bhat is in the midst of another period of persecution and harrassment from the government officials and certain other people of the community. They need our prayers.

"In April, Philemon Pathubhai was ordained to the ministry in the Bulsar church. In June two deacons were elected in the Jalalpor church and in July Hanochbhai Thakor and Manilal Gulabsingh were ordained to the ministry in Jalalpor. Since January 1, there have been seventeen baptisms in Jalalpor, eight in Bulsar and four in Bhat.

"At the hospital they are working on the expansion program, have blue-prints drawn and are soliciting money in the community. They have a number of pledges so far. Developments at Dahanu hospital are being watched as it will affect the expansion program at Bulsar, should Bulsar personnel need to continue in the work at Dahanu.

"Much building has gone on this spring at Bulsar. An old building has been demolished and a new missionary residence is almost completed. P. G. Bhagat moved here in May and set up the permanent headquarters of the Joint Council here. The remainder of the school building which is not being used for school since government took over the mission schools is being repaired for medical personnel. Dr. Peter, the Indian doctor, is in one apartment. Another apartment for a second Indian doctor is now being made ready and there will also be two smaller apartments prepared after the rainy season."

Landour

Now we will travel a thousand miles north to Landour. At this hill station in the Himalayas we may visit the well-known Woodstock School with an enrollment of 425 pupils, nineteen of whom have been enrolled from our own mission during 1955. Emma K. Ziegler is our mission representative on the staff. When it became necessary for her to undergo surgery about the middle of the year, Susan Shull served as substitute teacher for her class of thirty-four fifth graders. Three of our mission families, the Holderreeds, Florys and Masons are now on vacation and living at Prospect Point, our mission vacation house, that is, the mothers and children are up and the dads will be coming later. Competitive games, operettas, plays and concerts by the students and vacationing missionaries provide a real treat of high-quality entertainment during the year.

(In a future number of the Messenger there will appear news from the remaining five stations, Khergam, Ahwa, Vyara, Anklesvar and Umalla.)

Nigeria—Today

More Schools for More Children

Until this year, every child in the Church of the Brethren mission area who wanted to go beyond the fourth grade of school was faced with a long journey. Some of them had to travel fifty miles, others sixty-five, others eighty-two. For the great majority of them, the journey was on foot. Can you picture lads of twelve years walking eighty miles to go to school?

But distance was not the only problem. In the Brethren schools, the number of youngsters finishing fourth grade grew in three years from less than a hundred to the 210 who finished in 1954. There was room for only thirty-six in the senior primary school at Garkida. For the others, there was almost no hope of additional schooling.

But this year our earnest prayers were answered. This year new senior schools were opened at Lassa and at Marama. This year the long walks were shortened. This year the opportunity to advance was extended to more than a hundred children.

Can you see what this means in

A Year in Brethren Service

Lu Ann Sharp

The log cabin which is home for the BVS'ers who serve as schoolteachers at Mills Mountain, Virginia

IT WAS on a warm August day that we had our first breath-taking ride up Mills Mountain near Roanoke, Va. That day was the beginning of a year of wonderful experiences for Mary Ann McClure and me. From that day on we have many treasured memories.

Our duties were to teach school, prepare the Sunday-school and church services, visit and help wherever we could.

If you are wondering how the mountain got its name, you will understand when you hear that more than half the people there have the name of Mills.

We found much enjoyment in the old log cabin which became our home. It is more than a century old and has many of the characteristics of a pioneer home. We got our water from a spring, washed our clothes on a washboard, sawed and chopped our firewood.

The school and church are very important in this mountain community. They mean more than just an education—they are a place to fellowship and to learn how to get along with each other in a Christian way.

The schoolhouse is a five-year-old, one-room cinder-block building about a half mile from our log cabin home. Church services are also held in the school building. Some of the students have one mile or even two miles to walk to school, but neither rain nor snow keeps them away. The school consists of the first eight grades—twenty-two children in all. They have no modern equipment or playground. Without this school these children would have no opportunity to receive an education. Since no teachers can be secured through the school board of the county, you can see why it is so important to help support Brethren Service to send volunteers to the school.

Have you really stopped to think what Sunday school and church mean to you? Perhaps we would not until it was taken away from us. Here the church services are held in the afternoon and a minister comes twice a month. The need for spiritual food is as great here as at any other place. The discontinuation of the project during the summer months means a great lack in many lives.

During the year we formed a girls' teen club, which was something new to them, and they met at the time of our weekly prayer meetings. Our average attendance at prayer meeting was sixteen persons. I wonder how many of us would walk to a prayer meeting in the rain. During most of our meetings we studied the doctrines of the Church of the Brethren.

Come, take an imaginary visit with me into one of the mountain homes. As we walk down the dusty road we hear children's voices and soon we see them running and hiding. They hide, though, only until they get to know you well. As we enter the home we are greeted by friendly "hello's." We find the clean, neat home simply furnished. But the most important thing we find is happiness and a peace of mind and heart. You will find that Southern hospitality is great and, since they have asked us, let's stay on for supper. We are bound to taste some very good cooking—you will love that mountain bread. As we leave we feel uplifted. I know you would enjoy a real visit.

As Christmas time drew near we began making plans for a school Christmas play. The students took a very great interest in it and, on a cold, rainy night a few days before Christmas, we gave our play. Our Christmas tree, which some of the boys brought from the woods for us, seemed especially pretty. The real meaning and spirit of Christmas was deeply felt that night.

The winter was rather cold and school was dismissed several days because of the weather. With winter came another kind of beauty. The mountains seemed to be a fairyland of ice and snow.

Spring came soon and the beauty of God's nature revealed itself in budding trees, flowers and green hillsides. Soon many bare feet were treading in that new, fresh green grass.

All of nature coming alive once more reminded us of Christ's resurrection and soon Easter was here. On that wonderful day we enjoyed the most impressive sunrise service I have ever witnessed. There, with all of God's majestic beauty on that mountaintop, God's Son seemed to be sitting with us.

His loving hand seems ever present as we see such grandeur. This magnificence brings one closer to God, for which the mountain folks can be very thankful.

This project needs your prayers as well as your money. Remember that this is part of what our church is doing to help those in need. Are you doing your share?

Brethren Volunteers in Stroudsburg

EMERGENCY need calls for emergency action. The flood situation in Pennsylvania created such a need. Brethren Service workers who visited Stroudsburg, Pa., the town which suffered most, found that the greatest need was for workers to help restore order in this disaster area. Most of the 100 persons killed in the flood in Pennsylvania were from the Stroudsburg area. Water damage was very great; nearly everything in the town was left covered with silt and mud.

On Sept. 1 forty-four Brethren volunteers arrived in New Windsor, Md., to begin their two months of training for a year of service. What better training is possible than actual service? Plans for serving the flood area were quickly made and, soon after they arrived at New Windsor, these young people left to go to Stroudsburg. Through the next week they worked during the day to clean mud out of houses, streets and churches, helping Stroudsburg to become livable again. Each evening they studied the courses which had been planned for them.

You, too, may participate in this applied Christianity through your gifts of money, life and prayer.

PEACE LITERATURE

The Non-Combatant and Conscience. Reprint from the Gospel Messenger of Aug. 27, 1955. Here is an article which clearly and plainly reveals the mission of the noncombatant soldier. Told by high-ranking military officials to peace church representatives, it was made evident that noncombatant service in the armed forces has as its ultimate aim only that of military victory and not that of saving life. It will prove an eye-opener to Christians seeking the Christian approach to war and military service. Free.

AM I A CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTOR?

Dan West

YOU ARE PROBABLY NOT A CO—

1. If you believe, down deep in your heart, that there may well be some situations in which it would be God's will for you to take part in war.

2. If you believe that Americans should be prepared to fight, if necessary, for the things we hold dear. If you would be willing to have a bomb dropped on Moscow or some other city in order to "save" your home town.

3. If you would be willing to join the army in case the American shores were invaded or if a civil war should break out again in this country.

4. If you are willing to work in a job that helps the war effort directly—such as making guns or bombs.

5. If, while earnestly seeking God's will for your life, you believe it is his will for you not to be a CO.

YOU PROBABLY ARE A CO—

1. If you believe, down deep in your heart, that "all war is sin," and that God's will, as revealed in Jesus, demands a better way to settle disputes.

2. If you believe that America should spend her resources for finding and going this "better way"—to the point where there is nothing left over for military preparations.

3. If you believe that a truly Christian America would refuse to drop any bomb on Moscow or on any other city—even "in self-defense."

4. If you would refuse to work in any job that contributes directly to a war effort (such as making guns or bombs), even if such refusing would mean real sacrifice for you.

5. If you are earnestly seeking God's will for your life and believe that it is his will for you to be a CO.

TO BE A CO YOU DO NOT NEED—

1. To be actually perfect — although we are commanded in that direction. See Matt. 5:48.

2. To know exactly what you would do if your family were attacked by a maniac—although you should have some kind of answer if you are asked this question.

3. To know what the Russian government would do if the American government would quickly become pacifist. Nobody knows the correct answer to this question, as there has never been a large scale, long-time effort to try pacifism.

4. To renounce the whole idea of police force. One may observe that police always are supposed to be subject to law and to handle the individual criminal, instead of destroying other people and their property — also that policemen do not fight one another as armies do.

A Chance to Live

Using Foreign Mission Audio-Visuals in 1955-56

TRUE it is, more and more of our people are having an opportunity to see, first hand, the foreign outreach of the church. But even so, the large majority of us will need to see it second hand. Fortunately, the skillful use of audio-visuals can make our visits to points around the world fascinating and educational.

Here is a listing of the audio-visuals which will help your church do a better job of missionary education. The listing includes those audio-visuals produced by the Church of the Brethren as well as those which come to us through interdenominational co-operation. All are good materials which should receive careful usage by every one of our churches. Study the listing and order yours for the next twelve months from the Visual Education Service, 22 So. State St., Elgin, Ill. Key to abbreviations: F indicates 16mm sound film; FS, filmstrip; SFS, sound filmstrip.

Remember . . .

Because of the increasingly large number of schools of missions during the months of January and February it is impossible to fill every order for mission audio-visuals. To avoid disappointments you can

- Order early
- Give second and third choices when ordering
- Plan for mission audio-visuals during other months of the year.

While the story centers around a pioneer missionary in the interior of Brazil, the film presents a picture of many other types of work which characterize the missionary enterprise of Latin America. Junior high to adult. 31 minutes. Rental, $8.00.

Training New Missionaries

The Grand Rapids Annual Conference consecrated five new workers for service with our church in Nigeria. The Conference was happy to engage in this solemn act of Christian sending. As we did so we were at least partially aware of the fact that these representatives would be going into difficult work. Their faith, their bodies and their minds would receive severe testing.

Each of the new workers had been well trained for his work; two as nurses, three as teachers and churchmen. But to give them a better start in their mission assignments the Foreign Mission Commission felt it wise to send them to a six weeks' interdenominational missionary training school at Meadville, Pa. Here are interesting reports of their experiences there.

The Missionary Task

Robert Swank

THE purpose of the six-week interdenominational missionary training conference was to provide the best possible orientation course, during a short period of time, for missionaries who have already had their professional preparation and who are about to leave for their fields.

Under the leadership of dedicated Christian men and women like Dr. Kenneth A. Cragg of the Kennedy School of Missions; Dr. Frank Laubach, world renowned expert on literacy; Miss Ester Cummings, instructor of Missionary linguistics; Dr. Eugene Nida, translation secretary, American Bible Society; and Dr. Edward Blair, professor at Garrett Biblical Institute, we have learned that the missionary task is big enough to take all we have got and all that we can give. It was impressed upon us again and again that the Lord God does not simply say, "Do this," but "Be this."

Dr. Kenneth Cragg said: "The idea of the common oneness in Christ needs to go with us. We are the bearers of redemption in Jesus Christ. You never know what person you meet that may be another Saul of Tarsus. No one is so far off from Christ but that his conversion is to be expected."

Never has the conviction that Christ is too big to be only for us who are in America been as real to me as it was at Meadville. If the Christian message is not for all men it is not for me! No man or country or time is big enough to have the Christian message to themselves. If Christianity sees all men as one; then to be an instrument of the Divine does not mean to be a favorite. If we of the Church of the Brethren are instruments of God's purpose it is because we are serving something bigger than ourselves. We can only be instruments as we keep the instrument subdued in respect to a greater purpose.

The missionary task is the serving of something bigger than itself. We cannot always be responsible for people's reactions but we are responsible for our own intentions; therefore the task of the missionary is to lead people to Christ, not tie them to ourselves or to Western culture. The question that arises is this: How can we ever be big enough and wise enough to be the communicators of the gospel to the people? It seems that our duty is to proclaim Christ with the expectation of discipleship.

For every missionary who goes to the field there should be many more who do not go, except in spirit. Your task is to pray for us.

Area Studies

Glenn H. Shank

INCLUDED in the program of the conference were courses dealing with five major mission areas, namely, Near East, India, Southeast Asia, Latin America and Africa. The members of the conference were assigned to the particular area group which included the country of their appointment.

For the first three weeks of the conference, two hours were spent each afternoon in area study. This time was spent in group discussions, individual reports and lectures by the leader. In the three weeks, each area group had two main leaders.

The African group had two able leaders in the persons of Dr. George W. Carpenter and Rev. John A. Reuling. Both men have spent considerable time in Africa and know their fields very well.

One of the highlights of the entire conference was the presence of Christian nationals from other lands. Among these was a young couple from Japan, two young ladies from the Philippines, two young men and a former professor from southern India, and an African from Southern Rhodesia. The many opportunities of fellowship with these proved to be an inspiration. It was most gratifying to associate with Christians of other lands—Christian because of the efforts of former missionaries who had in years past responded to the great commission. Each of these gave their testimony as to the value and need of Christian missions.

Our attention was focused upon the many problems of Africa which are involved in mission work. Among the problems discussed were white supremacy, the growing spirit of nationalism, the ills of colonialism, unequal distribution of land, migrant labor, infiltration of Western culture, and illiteracy. Problems more specifically related to a missionary were also discussed. Among these were new adjustments, standards of living, language and education.

Devotional Study of the Bible

Jean H. Shank

ON EVERY hand we are confronted with the Bible. Those who contemplate missionary service must keep its message in their hearts, its Word in their mouths and its teachings in their lives. How can one best study this great Book in his private devotional life? At the missionary training conference, several teachers gave their views.

The books of the Bible need to be studied individually. A small book is like a single one-roomed house. A longer book is like a large house and one often remains in one room and loses sight of the whole house. The average reading of the Bible is described as "honey-bee flitting." In reading a magazine story one would not think of picking out random paragraphs to read on different days.

The Bible needs to be read as units of thought. Not all of the book are units, but most of them are. To read portions out of context is like ducking for apples, blindfolded. More than one half of the sixty-six books can be read in twenty minutes, none requiring an hour. Reading cover to cover is not recommended to most readers, because the perplexing problems confronted in Genesis tend to bog down the reader. Rather, it is suggested that reading should begin with Christ in the book of Mark. Several quick readings of one book will enable the reader to gain a perspective before treating the individual ideas presented.

Each professor who treated the devotional study of the Bible had an entirely different approach. Space does not permit enlarging upon these theses. All stressed the need for a rich and regular devotional study. How can one be effective unless he has the ammunition with which to win others?

This study was not confined to classroom lectures, but early morning devotional services in the chapel helped all to begin each day with a right attitude toward God. We sensed a need for a renewed understanding of the Word.

Just as a symphony needs instruments to express the fullness of the composition, just so the gospel needs men to proclaim the fullness of Christ. All are instruments of God. One must be the Word of God in life, word and deed.

Linguistics

Mary Louise Swank

GUTEN MORGEN, Good morning. Though these words have the same meanings they are only understood by those who have ears to hear. We have a common language—a love which can radiate to all around us, but not only do we need the love which Jesus has shown us, we also need a verbal language by which we can communicate.

The linguistic course offered at the missionary training conference was one of the most beneficial and practical phases presented to us. It was taught by Miss Ruth Cummings, who is now teaching linguistics to the missionaries in Brazil.

She first analyzed our own language as to hearing vowels and consonants. Then we learned the organs of speech necessary to make them. This analysis is necessary so that we will be able to do it with a new language.

In order to understand the people

Brethren Youth Caravans

Edward K. Ziegler

THE Brethren Youth Caravan program for sharing Christ and building the church has just been concluded for the summer of 1955 as of Aug. 28. Fifteen young people participated in the program this summer. Seven teams of two each served churches as will be indicated below. One young man, George Mendenhall of Covington, Ohio, participated in the training program and kept in touch with the program during the summer, but served in his own local church.

The training program was conducted at Camp Sugar Grove, Covington, Ohio. Instructors were Edward K. and Ilda B. Ziegler and Dorothy Hummer. Others who were there for a brief period of time also made a contribution to the camp training program. We deeply appreciate the courtesy of the managers of Camp Sugar Grove, and particularly of Robert Rhoades, the resident manager, for the facilities of the camp and their unfailing courtesy and helpfulness in making the arrangements for the training program there. The training program was carried on from June 22 to July 1, when the caravaners left for their projects.

The list of caravaners is as follows:

Gloria Anderson, Lowpoint, Ill. (Manchester College)
Clyde Carter, Jr., Bassett, Va. (Bridgewater College)
Glenna Glick, Bridgewater, Va. (Bridgewater College)
Kathleen Kestner, Twin Falls, Idaho (Seattle Pacific College)
Fern Liskey, Annville, Pa. (Lebanon Valley College)
Irene Litton, Boonsboro, Md.
Bill Looker, Bradford, Ohio (Manchester College)
Edith Merkey, Cloud Chief, Okla. (Bethany Seminary)
Hazel Lee Miles, Leonard, Mo.
Shirley Neher, Wenatchee, Wash. (LaVerne College)
Albert P. Nyce, Vernfield, Pa.
Mary Ann Scruggs, Campobello, S. C.
Dick Simmons, Toledo, Ohio (Manchester College)
Marilyn Whitmore, Liberty, Ill.

The teams and the work they did are indicated as follows:

Dick Simmons and Al Nyce assumed practically the whole church program for the Spray church in North Carolina. They were able to win quite a number of people to Christ, took care of morning and evening services and prayer meeting, revised the membership roll and prepared a new directory of church members and made a new card file on each family. They report a very rich experience and have received highest praise from the workers and the elder of the Spray church. There has been currently no pastor in the Spray church.

Edith Merkey and Mary Ann Scruggs carried on four two-week daily vacation Bible schools in Western Maryland under the direction of Norman Harsh, who is the executive secretary of Western Maryland and West Virginia. They did a very remarkable piece of work, not only carrying on the vacation schools, but doing a great deal of work with young people as well.

Glenna Glick and Fern Liskey conducted vacation church schools in Second Virginia. They spent five weeks conducting Bible schools, two weeks as camp leaders at Camp Bethel and one week in visitation in one of the mission churches of the district. They conducted youth meetings, taught Sunday-school classes and visited in more than fifty homes during their period of service. Their work was under the direction of the district board of Second Virginia.

Kathleen Kestner and Irene Litton spent four weeks working at Flint, Mich., and three weeks in Lansing, Mich. In Flint they worked a great deal with junior highs and assisted in daily vacation Bible schools. They also assisted in conducting prayer meetings and one of the girls served as a pianist during her stay there. In Lansing they did a great deal of canvassing and also taught Sunday-school classes. In addition they attended a work camp at Camp Brethren Heights.

Bill Looker and Clyde Carter worked under the direction of Bro. Blair Helman in the Wichita church in Kansas. They had as their chief responsibility starting a program of youth work in Wichita, where there have been few active youth in the church. Their report indicates a rather busy summer in which they worked a great deal with young people. These young men spent some time also visiting the inactive members of the church. They were able to get a youth choir started which seemed to work very well. They had as high as twenty-eight members in the youth choir. They also had from sixteen to twenty-six young people attending many other functions which they conducted during the summer. Their work seems to be of considerable significance.

Gloria Anderson and Hazel Lee Miles worked in the Parsons church in Kansas under the direction of Bro. Robert Teegarden. Parsons is a small city church and they found that there was quite a large percentage of older members, a small group of young married people, and the rest children. They found no one at first between the ages of fifteen and thirty. They assisted in setting up a program of recreation for the summer and quite a large number of children participated in it. They also directed the daily vacation Bible school with seven teachers participating in it. One of the significant activities of these girls was carrying on a comprehensive canvass of the area around the church. During this canvass they made 836 calls in homes of the area. They also visited most of the members of the church and had a noteworthy experience in doing this.

Marilyn Whitmore and Shirley Neher worked in the Robins church, Iowa. The pastor of this church, Bro. Russell Burriss, is also pastor of the church in Cedar Rapids. Robins is a small rural church with a quite small membership, but it is the only church in the community. The girls put on a program of recreation, made a survey of the community and made many contacts for the church in this place.

These young people on the average were older and had a year or two more of education than the level of age and training of the youth caravaners for the previous two summers. They were a very excellent group, and some of them have outstanding ability which I believe will be used for the church. Two of them, at least, as a result of the training program and this experience are showing deep interest in the Christian ministry as a life work.

It has been a happy privilege to work with the forty-three young people who have been in the program thus far and I believe that it has great possibilities for the church.

terms of the Christian church in Nigeria? This means that in a land where schools are so closely related to religion—Islam, Romanism, Christianity—these children will be two years longer under the influence of the church. They will have two more years of growth. They will have two more years of ripening toward a Christian maturity.

Love Feast in Nigeria

Here in Nigeria, there will be about 1,500 members of our church joining the great world-wide fellowship of Christian communion. The love feast is a truly thrilling service in this land. Let me share the thrill with you.

John Grimley and Irven Stern went along with newly ordained Pastor Karbam to the Gashala church for baptism and for their most recent love feast. After they had baptized forty-seven new members, they began the love feast. And in that church where the total membership at that time was 181, there were 177 communicants. The good folk of Gashala have a close fellowship with one another and with Christ.

At Garkida's love feast, two young men from southern Nigeria were visitors. Artisans in the north for work, they did not understand the Bura language. When two of our Christian youth saw the visitors, they joined them, translated for them, explained the service and shared their food. The young visitors stated that they were Christians, and they shared in the service. Afterward, we learned that they are of the Anglican Church, and this was a valuable new experience for them.

Occasionally it is discovered that some usually attendant member is absent from the love feast. Almost always, when such a person is asked why he was missing, he gives an answer like this: "My heart was angry with Yamba; so I did not feel that I could share in a feast of love." He takes his love feast seriously, you see. Next time, he will be there, his heart right for fellowship.

Around Nigeria

Fourteen miles east of the new mission station at Mubi, Stover Kulp has found another small group of believers in Christ. In spite of the very evident efforts of the Moslem authorities to frighten them, this group, which has moved in from the French territory farther east, continues to carry on in Christian worship.

They use a songbook in the Fulani language, which was prepared by the Lutheran Brethren mission and their service is in Fulani. The language problem is a very real one in the Mubi area. But there is real strength available for such groups as this one as they find themselves a part of a larger Christian fellowship. There are no tribes and languages before God but the tribe of his kingdom and the language of his Love.

Two men have been ordained thus far this year into the full Christian ministry. Mallam Karbam Mamza was the first Margi in history to be ordained when that service was held at Lassa. Mallam Madu Mshelia was the first Bura to be ordained when that service was held a few weeks later at Marama.

The Church of the Brethren in Nigeria is pushing its roots deeper and deeper into the soil which is the life of the people.

There are sixty beds in the hospital at Garkida. It is staffed by one doctor, one American nurse, two Nigerian (men) nurses, and a number of workers with a minimum of training in addition to their fourth-grade education.

But this staff treated during the past year a total of nearly 1,500 hospital patients. They gave the enormous number of 125,000 treatments to nearly 10,000 outpatients. And this story could be duplicated by the Lassa hospital or by the Leprosarium, where new methods of treatment of leprosy have made the hospital more and more important. The dispensaries at Marama, Wandali, Waka, Shaffa, Chibuk and Gulak treat additional thousands of people.

These medical workers work endlessly. But they labor not for themselves, but in the name of him who is the Great Physician. For they bring healing arts to the fellowship.

Nvwa Balami, teacher in the junior primary school at Marama, hopes to take up a new work for the church. He is resigning his teaching position in order to begin supervision of the classes in religious instruction in the Marama area.

The demand for additional schooling far exceeds the present facilities

These news items from India and Nigeria were reported by Susan Shull for India and Charles Bieber for Nigeria. Josephine Flory's news for Ecuador will appear next week.

These classes, through which many are led into the church each year, are under the care of a group of men who are, for the most part, poorly trained but very sincere. Mallam Nvwa will be able to give them both guidance and encouragement.

The building program at Waka goes on apace. It centers in the girls' school development, with the building of classrooms, boarding compounds for the students, store for wood and equipment and staff residences. But in addition to this there has been a great deal of grading, landscaping, road improvement and additional building throughout the Training Center.

This expansion of facilities hardly keeps up with the continued growth of Waka in size and service. And except for part of the cost of one residence, it is being financed entirely by Nigerian government funds.

Effort is being made in several directions to improve the standards of these rural people. At Chibuk Gerald Neher is raising poultry for distribution to the people. At Marama Monroe Good is hoping to improve the breed of hogs. At Waka Dallas Oswalt gives instruction in farming to the teachers in training. Harold Royer has distributed a great number of fruit trees for the development of small native orchards.

The mission in Nigeria is fighting its own battle of the bulge. The bulge in this case is the wall of the schoolbuilding, on which tremendous pressure has been placed by the great influx of students this year. The already overcrowded rooms have had to receive, in these two years, from 50% to 100% more pupils than two years ago.

Of the twenty junior primary schools now in operation, only four or five are adequate, and they only because the people have not yet sprung awake to the value of a Christian education. But of the others, where enlightenment proceeds, seven need new buildings immediately if they are to be able to accept the pupils who are applying.

These pupils and their parents come saying, "We want the kind of Christian teaching you have given our people in the past. We do not want the Moslem schools." Can we get there early enough with space and staff enough or must we refuse to make this Christian teaching available to them?

we may meet on a road in any country, we must be able to speak the language at their rate of speaking. We are given points on how to obtain this.

Some of the most difficult days for new missionaries occur when they first get to their fields and find that they are not able to speak to the people they came to serve. Miss Cummings showed us how to cope with these disappointments and prepared us for the laughter we may receive from the nationals because of the poor presentation of their native language.

A new missionary was studying Arabic. He had difficulty in making a vowel sound used often in that language. He walked to the village square to practice this sound and found he had many people to help and to laugh at him. After a month, while on his usual afternoon stroll and practice, he found the people no longer found him amusing. He went to his missionary colleague about his puzzlement and to his surprise he was told that the utterance which he made now was like the local inhabitants and they no longer found him funny.

Not only must we be able to speak the language of the nationals, but we must be able to think in it and think like them.

The important task is before us, for in this course we have explored only the things which must be done. Formation, vowels and consonant sounds, will only be phases with which to work. The final goal will be fluent speaking which will be necessary to tell our story of Jesus and his redeeming love, to teach illiterates to read, to help the sick that they may be whole.

The first year we will receive this vital tool through day-by-day study with our African teacher and aid from our missionary colleagues. And God will open our mouths "that we may speak."

THE DAY'S SCHEDULE

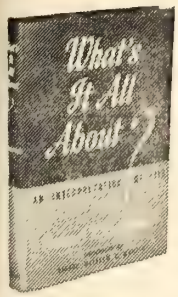
Iris E. Neff

MEADVILLE, Pa. What would we do? What would we learn? We were all praying that the Lord would teach us those things which we so vitally needed in preparation for his work.

Every day of the missionary training conference was filled to overflowing. The day started with chapel before breakfast and, following breakfast, three hours of class. In the afternoon there were two more hours of class and frequently in the evening there would be an additional lecture or discussion period.

Our study was divided into four major areas: Bible study, the missionary task, linguistics and the study of the country to which we were going. In addition, there were lectures on various phases of mission work presented by outstanding leaders. Dr. Eugene Nida spoke on translating the Bible, Dr. Frank Laubach discussed literacy methods and Dr. Ira Moomaw spoke on rural and agricultural missions. Also there was an interesting series of lectures on Christianity and Communism, by Dr. Daniel Fetler.

Every day after the afternoon classes, two hours were free for recreation.



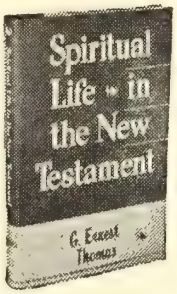
The conference was attended by 128 missionaries of fourteen denominations preparing to go to twenty-four countries of the world. Sharing our hopes and aspirations, as well as our problems, was a rich experience. Certainly one gained a panoramic view of missions around the world and the urgency which is being manifested in many places.

Perhaps one of the greatest benefits of the conference was the spiritual inspiration received from informal devotional and Bible study groups which sprang up. As we were seeing the scope of our missionary task, we felt inadequate to meet the challenge. Realizing that all our strength and ability were in the Lord, there was only one place to go—to him. Rising at dawn for one's own private devotions and then meeting in a group for Bible study before chapel, or at the close of the day, we found wherein our strength lay.

Whether at work, play or study, the fellowship of the conference was keenly felt. We were preparing for one purpose—to make Christ known. The unity in this purpose was tremendous as we were soon to scatter and go out to work.

WHAT'S IT ALL ABOUT?

An Interpretation of Life



by ROBERT E. GOODRICH, JR.

Introduction by Bishop William C. Martin

Today more people than ever before are asking: What role should religion play in my life? In answer, Dr. Goodrich makes crystal clear the relationship between man, life, and religion. He shows us that evidence of God's love cannot be found on the "far horizon," but, rather, right inside our lives—and that faith can become a vital part of each of us only through prayer, spiritual growth, unselfishness, and trust in God. $2.50

SPIRITUAL LIFE IN THE NEW TESTAMENT

by G. ERNEST THOMAS

Straight from the New Testament itself, this book draws an inspiring picture of the devotional lives of the earliest Christians. The author traces the beginnings of regular church attendance, family devotions, prayer, witnessing, stewardship, daily work, fellowship, etc. He shows that these were not merely duties, but avenues of spiritual strength which can equally well enrich our lives today. $2.00

RURAL PREACHING

by EDWARD K. ZIEGLER

While the Gospel is the same everywhere, in rural areas it must be presented in a manner suited to the needs and spirit of rural people. So says the author, a widely experienced authority. Specifically he discusses: (1) the vital role of preaching in rural work, (2) areas of the Gospel of special interest, (3) how the minister can apply his message to rural people, (4) special rural occasions for preaching, (5) problems of presentation and preaching practice. $2.00

Baltimore, First — Special Holy Week services were held with John H. Eberly as guest minister. The men's work group had a surprise supper for the women with entertainment being furnished by the Baltimore Firemen's Chorus. The mothers' club sponsored a family life institute at our church under the leadership of Brother and Sister Nevin Zuck. A musical concert was given by the Bridgewater College Glee Club. The annual mother and daughter banquet was held with the presentation of a Biblical play which was written and directed by two of our members. During April and May our superintendent incorporated into the Sunday-school opening a series of eight short talks pertaining to the beliefs of the Church of the Brethren. Each Sunday a layman discussed for three minutes a specific Brethren belief. Appropriate booklets were secured from Elgin and distributed. This instructive and much needed presentation was so well received, the idea is recommended for use in other Sunday schools. In the spring the Boy Scout troop No. 655 was formed at our church and on June 30 the charter was presented. A bon voyage reception was held on July 31 for Mary Lou Zimmerman who is going to Germany for one year as an exchange student.—Helen A. Vance, Baltimore, Md.

Season of Remembrance

AUTUMN is a time for thoughtfulness. The air of an October day is often crisp and clear. Though trees stand forth in a riot of color, this is the mellow season. The green days of summer, covering the throbbing pulse of an earth that is restless with its growing, now yield to the calm enjoyment of their own fruitfulness. There is a wispy haze along the lower rim of the sky. There is a keen and crackling sting to the morning's frost that daubs the earth with silver. It is a time for garnering each harvest, for assessing the bounty of the good soil, for giving sober thanks and expressing joyful gratitude to the Lord of every season, the God of every autumn.

Autumn is a time to reckon our own stewardship. It is an occasion to render our thanksgiving to God. It is a season of remembrance and a period of self-examination. How have we shared God's bounty? What have we done with his abundance? Dare we stock-pile his gifts in the cellars of our selfishness? The thankful heart needs not only a voice to express its gratitude but an outstretched hand to divide its plenty with a neighbor. Until we have shared to the point of sacrifice we have not learned the full joy of autumn abundance.

A Challenge

Reading a reprint from a magazine, Bar Management, the following statements impressed me. "We will leave no stone unturned to make the month of May the biggest single promotion on behalf of taverns since repeal. We will insure the success of the observance by the complete co-operation of every individual tavern owner, as well as the state and local associations. Every medium of advertising will be used in bringing the story of national tavern month to the public. Advertising mediums will include TV, radio, newspapers and magazines. Billboard posters will also carry the message."

Could our church present to us a definite plan, whereby we will leave no stone unturned to find ways to fight this terrible evil in our country? Could our church help us, through a definite plan, to bring to the public the true story of the deadly and sinful effect of the use of alcoholic beverages?

Could our church give us renewed courage and strength to carry, through the medium of advertising, the message of our Christian convictions concerning this evil, with more interest and faithfulness since the time of repeal?

We all know the present successful and increased sale and use of alcoholic beverages. With a plan whereby we could promote and encourage the complete co-operation of each individual of the church, we too, might have more success and increased "sale," against the use of alcoholic beverages.—Mrs. Glen Liebert, Delphi, Ind.

Pet Peeves or Deep Concerns?

I always enjoy reading your editorials. The one entitled "Pet Peeves or Deep Concerns?" especially interested me. It was in the August 13 issue of the Gospel Messenger. I am sending you this bit of doggerel which it inspired (?), just for fun.

Once there was a modest sinner
Who would rather miss his dinner
Than be caught away from meeting
And the gossip heard while greeting
All the folk attending church;
"I don't like our nosy preacher,
Or his wife, for he should teach her
First the things he bids us do
And keep happy in the pew
All the folk attending church."

But there came a time when some one Started preaching, "You must love one—
If you want to go to heaven,
Put away the sinful leaven—
All you folk attending church!"
And though you may not believe it,
Modest sinner did achieve it;
And while some got mad—deserted,
Many others got converted
Of the folk attending church.

If you wish to know the ending
And the moral, it is blending
Pew and pulpit by the preacher,
With the Holy Ghost as teacher
Of the folk attending church;
When there's unity, and God's way,
And the end of Satan's hearsay,
Then the sinner comes confessing—
And God sends his choicest blessing
On the folk attending church.

—Mildred Allen Jeffery, Medford, Oregon.

A New Commandment

We enjoy the challenge brought by the Gospel Messenger each week. Especially interesting are the articles which show what our people are doing in home missions and foreign missions.

"A New Commandment" seems to be championed by our people in a way that cannot be argued against. I was in a church recently where the minister seemed proud of his chaplaincy and boasted of the rough stuff. On arriving home these lines fell into place in my thinking.

Oh, for a minor prophet,
To rise from among us now
And dare to say,
In a dangerous day
That the sword should become a plow.

Oh, for a leader powerful
To challenge this false brigade,
Of pastors instilling
Condonement for killing
Whom our Lord would surely upbraid.

This bad verse is but an expression to let you know that we are with you in your efforts to continue the peace testimony. May I offer a suggestion? So many of our eighteen-year-olds are not law minded. They need step one, step two, etc., in declaring their convictions, relative to the draft boards. Could a pocket-sized folder be printed to show a lad how to proceed providing he is totally pacifist? —Elmer Leckrone, Jenison, Mich.

"I Have Sinned Against Heaven"

THESE are the words of the prodigal, thought out in the pig sty and spoken in the embrace of his father. They speak powerfully to a generation which far more than challenge needs confession; far more than causes, forgiveness; and far more than an earthly task, however noble, a hope which is planted in eternity.

What does the prodigal's heavy cry say to us?

First, it declares that sin is an inverted relationship between man and God. Under the influence of liberalism on the one hand and literalism on the other, sin as a concept relevant to the nature of man has undergone double misinterpretation. On the one hand, sin is considered to be an irresponsible orientation to one's fellow men. On the other, sin is interpreted as what one does in terms of petty morals. Now no serious person denies the claims of a disciplined, moral life. Nor does he deny the validity of the second great commandment. But sin is neither of these omissions nor actions, though both bear evidences to the larger infection. Sin is not merely what we do. It is a law that we find to be present. Sin is the love of self, billowing out until it fills the whole world. Sin is the central unwillingness to bring every thought and act and plan, however dearly held, under the light of God's judgment and love.

Sin declares a lack of trust. We are so sure of ourselves, so unsure of God. To the natural man, all existence seems to argue against God who is spirit and love. To the Christian man, all existance is suffused and transformed, filled with sufficient evidences of God's presence and love.

The sin of the prodigal, then was not essentially his riotous living. The riotous living, to be sure, was a result. Nor was his sin, fundamentally, his failure to organize the swineherds of Galilee for higher wages and shorter hours, not to speak of a more balanced diet. Sin comes into this parable at the point where the young son says, "Give me the share of property that falls to me," with the obvious intention of what is actualized later, rather than faithfulness. All men sense what the young son's demand means, both to himself and to the father; it is the problem of freedom that is here involved. The young son had to leave home to exercise his freedom in the places where virtue bears no status. Had he not done this, he would not have sinned, in the moralistic sense. But he also would not have come to himself, as a free being. It is instructive to note that the elder son, no prodigal he, yet "refused to go in" to the joyous feast that celebrates the home-coming. This is something to ponder deeply when we assume growth without travail, peace without pain, joy without suffering. The younger son had to go into the world. And the father submitted to the son's request, doubtless with the knowledge that the son was rebelling against that which was his good. For the father knew that he had given and would continue to give that which alone would redeem him from his rebellion: love.

Further, let us note that the freedom which we have is indeed so real that we can use it to rebel against the best there is. This is the meaning of the love of the father, and analogically of the love of God. This is very difficult for the human mind, but is existentially known by the human heart.

As humans, we desire laws, and we judge by those laws. We erect legalisms to act as norms. On the basis of these legalisms we say, "He is a good man" or "He is a sinner." When we do this, we have missed the meaning of the perversity of sin, and have disqualified ourselves to apprehend the mystery of grace.

For sin against law cannot be compared to sin against love. What the prodigal did has meaning as we see it in this context. His sin was rebellion against love. This was a sublime, God-like love which the father exhibited, that he could trust its power even during the days when his son was home-less. It is not sentimentality to picture the waiting father, to enter into his loneliness, to imagine the terrible agony that lived with him. Rather, it is the scandal of the Christian faith, reaching into the mystery of holiness. He could not seek his son, for that would violate the freedom of the son. He could not "write him off" on a legalistic basis, to save his honor, for he loved him. He could wait, already having given him his love, trusting that love. The heinousness of sin—to rebel against love—is here seen, as it is seen also in the powers that put the Lord on the cross. The love of God—patient, but confident, because it is of God—becomes a real and compelling thing, as seen in the figure of the father.

Finally, this must be a point of emphasis: that the father must wait, for the sin had been against heaven, and this opposition could be removed only by repentance. The son had to "come to himself," and go home believing (that is, trusting) the goodness and the forgiveness of his father, who remained faithful to his nature as loving father throughout the son's rebellion.

Certainly it is not easy to do this; to believe, simply by believing. How absurb; To act in the confidence that God does forgive, and by that act to let the forgiveness come dynamically to us—this, certainly to the legalist, is a large portion of foolishness. But it is the foolishness of the gospel that God proclaimed in Christ.

And even after the step of faith, to see that our life is hemmed about by our temporal nature—this too is difficult and requires of us an undeviating fidelity. It is so much easier to say, "Now the sin is all gone, and I can make a new set of rules." But if it is our nature to live not by sight, but by faith, to know in part, not as we are known, then all our attempts to storm the gates of heaven are doomed to failure, and we to disillusionment.

For we are pilgrims in the earth, and we have no abiding city. And how difficult it is to live with agony, only those initiated into Christ's sufferings can testify. But how impossible it is to "make it all come out right" by some new manipulation, some untried panacea, the Christian knows by observing what happened to his Lord. For

No Trivial Disciplines

THE supreme fact in the history of religion was the absolute trust of Jesus in God and his unquestioning obedience to the divine will. The Father was so real to the Son and the desire to do what was right in God's sight was so intense that faith and devotion enabled Jesus to say, "Nevertheless, not my will but thine be done." Through joy and anguish our Lord remained steadfast to this commitment. This required of him that he endure the insolence and derision of the religious authorities, accept the brutal cruelty of the Roman officials and experience denial and betrayal by his dearest friends. And finally there swept over him the dark night of the soul when momentarily he felt that even God had forsaken him.

It is this Lord who summons us to follow him, whatever the cross, wherever he leads. We see the contemporary meaning of this requirement in the lives of Kagawa and Schweitzer, in the divine audacity of those Christians who befriended Jews in the days of Hitler, and in the unsung heroism of the faithful in China.

God have mercy on our souls for the glib complacency with which we conform to this world and seek its prizes! And how shameful is our neglect of the means of grace! And how trivial our spiritual discipline! These steps at least are mandatory: practice the presence of God in short prayers many times a day and an unhurried time-exposure of our souls to God at least once a day; keep our minds saturated with the record of Jesus' teaching, example and unmerited suffering; worship in the sanctuary with regularity in the spirit of reverence and commitment; experience fellowship in prayer and thought and action with an intimate group; endeavor as our foremost aim in life to maintain right relations with God and with neighbors and enemies; do what we know to be right in God's sight because it is right and leave the consequences in his hands.

Who Is the Heretic?

A LUTHERAN clergyman was suspended for heresy after he had been found guilty of "doctrinal deviation" by a trial committee of his synod. A Presbyterian minister, noted for his liberal views, was "defrocked" because of his stated views though no action was taken against him because of his radical activities. A minister in the Free-will Baptist church was also relieved of his ministry when he persisted in teaching the doctrine of "eternal security." Thus within recent months heresy trials have been in the news and questions arise sometimes as to who is the heretic.

Certainly it should be clear that when ministerial rights and privileges are granted in connection with vows to uphold the official doctrines of a church, that same body has a right, even an obligation in some instances, to withhold the ministry of one who knowingly breaks his vows. In the case of denominations having a well-defined doctrinal position, it should not be surprising that one who teaches a doctrine at variance with it should be disciplined or even disqualified from preaching. This does not mean that he may not be a sincere Christian or that his particular "heresy" may not have more of God's truth in it than the prevailing doctrine. It simply means that he must look elsewhere for a fellowship in which to worship and a platform to proclaim his views.

In the case of noncreedal churches, like the Church of the Brethren, it is far more difficult to determine just who is the heretic. We have insisted only on the acceptance of the New Testament as the basis of our belief and practice. Obviously this permits great latitude in interpretation and variations in the way we acknowledge our discipleship. We have to be tolerant of some extremes that may seem distasteful to us. We have to make room for varied views in the fellowship just as we learn to accept varied personalities in the family circle. We need to practice far more patience and long-suffering than might be required if our convictions were more narrowly defined.

Whenever we hear the cry of heresy shouted because of "doctrinal deviations," we tremble to think of the real scandal that would ensue if the great majority of Christians were ever called to account for the wide gap between their profession and their practice. How many of us pray the Lord's prayer "as we forgive" with never the slightest intention of forgiving anybody? How regularly we fail to turn the other cheek or go the second mile. How eager we become to bear false witness by our gossiping, by our tattling over the grapevine, by our silence when an innocent person is wrongly accused. "If thou, O Lord, shouldst mark iniquities, Lord, who could stand?"

Who could, indeed? Not he who is doctrinally pure but morally careless. Not he who cries "Lord, Lord," but fails to do what his Lord commands. Not the righteous Pharisee who boasts of his piety or his rectitude. Let him that is without sin among us cast the first stone.

By all means let us strive for purity of doctrine, but let us be slow to brand as heretical what we cannot endorse. Some ancient heresies are now respectable dogmas. If every heretic's ideas had burned with him at the stake, the Christian movement would long ago have lost its vitality. But truth has a way of surviving even the label of heresy. And it is truth, said Jesus, that sets us free.—K.M.

Leaving the Lord Out of It

THERE are only two Protestant churches in the small village of Milan, Illinois, but the pastors of these churches have already incurred the wrath of their local village board. When some racing promoters wanted to locate a new, multimillion-dollar track in the village, the local board gave its approval with only the village physician voting against the invasion of large-scale betting in the neighborhood. When the two pastors protested, the village attorney charged them with trying "to influence political action under the cloak of piety and sanctity." He told reporters, "I say, let's leave the Lord out of it."

Likely there are a number of persons in the two Protestant churches who also would prefer to "leave the Lord out" of any discussion affecting their community. They might do well to take a close look at other communities where gambling has been encouraged and vice tolerated. They can see the obvious results of "leaving the Lord out." Why is it that commercial interests are so eager to bring the Lord into their sales appeals, their popular advertising programs, their full-page spreads in the magazines, but when the Lord might possibly put the brakes on some new venture or he might have something to say relating to political action they want to leave him out? Many city councils now open their meetings with prayer. Is the Lord to be excused after the opening devotions?—K.M.

If you have infinite patience, a love for children, nerves that can stand the wear and tear of child raising, then you too might become a professional mother

Ellis G. Guthrie

PROFESSIONAL MOTHER

ARE you one of the many women who need to supplement the family income but, for one of several reasons, feel it unwise to work away from home? If so, you might be interested in how one woman met this problem by becoming a professional mother. A professional mother can earn some greatly needed dollars while, at the same time, she renders a needed and worthwhile service to humanity.

Mrs. Elsie Guthrie of Route one, Lafayette, Ohio, faced this problem of insufficient income in the summer of 1940. Her husband was in poor health and no longer able to operate their small twenty-seven-acre farm, for which they were still in debt. His salary as pastor of a small country church amounted, at that time to about six hundred dollars a year (he died in 1947). Besides the debt on the farm there were buildings to repair, a daughter to send to junior high school and a son who wanted to go to college.

It was obvious that the small family income, lessened by her husband's inability to care for the farm and to rent additional fields, was woefully inadequate. She must find a way to get additional funds. But how? She could have found employment as a cook, a housekeeper or as a practical nurse. However, all of this would have taken her away from home and she felt that she was needed there to care for her growing daughter and her semi-invalid husband. She solved her problem by giving a home to children whose parents could not or would not make a worthy home for them.

Mrs. Guthrie applied for children at the welfare agency in a near-by city and on August 26, 1940, received her first two children—a boy and a girl. From then till May 1955 she had seventy-eight children in her home, ranging in age from seven weeks to thirteen years. They have been there anywhere from a few days to over eight years. Children have been returned to Mrs. Guthrie as often as two times after the initial placement. The parent would take the child, thinking he was able to make a home for him. Then sickness or some other adverse circumstance would strike and he would be forced to return the child. Almost always the child received the news with joy, which is a commentary on the kind of love and treatment he reeceived when boarding in this private home.

This may seem like an easy way to earn money and one that could scarcely be counted as a humanitarian service. But as anyone knows who has taken children to board this can be rugged, especially when there are from four to eight children (Mrs. Guthrie has had as high as eight children at one time) running in and out in all kinds of weather, shouting, playing, fighting. No one with nervous tendencies should consider boarding more than one or two children.

There are other factors that enter in to make this a trying vocation. Of the seventy-eight children who came to board with Mrs. Guthrie over fifty were from broken homes. Many of these children responded to the Christian influence of the home; others became real problems.

Take the case of one boy (we shall call him Bobby although that is not his real name). When Mrs. Guthrie first took him his father was in prison. His mother divorced several husbands after separating from Bobby's father. At least twice she bore children to men who were not her husband at the time. Despite this background Bobby was a likeable boy in many ways. He finally overcame a habit of bedwetting brought on, no doubt, by his feelings of insecurity. One time he said to Mrs. Guthrie: "My father and mother fought: my mother and stepfather fight; and my father and stepmother fight. That's all I know."

Cases like these are many—not few. It is heartbreaking to have a child from this kind of background respond to the Christian atmosphere of the home, perhaps join church, and then to have him dragged back into the old way of life. There is nothing that can be done except to pray that somehow the few short months or years will be enough to make him into a good citizen. But you are afraid, terribly afraid, that they will not.

There is another kind of heartache that is just as keen. This comes about by taking very young children. You care for them, love them and watch them grow. Then when they seem like your very own they are taken from you.

Two sisters, Joan and Bell, are an example of this. After their mother died their father brought them to Mrs. Guthrie. Joan was about six years old and Bell only six months. After caring for them nearly three years their father remarried and took the children into his new home. The sisters wanted to come back and visit their foster home but the stepmother was jealous and would not hear of it. Perhaps this was best in the long run but that did not ease the immediate hurt of both Mrs. Guthrie and the children.

Sometimes a child will cry when his parents come to take him home for a week-end visit. This is highly gratifying to the ego but there is a tinge of sadness too. You wonder what kind of treatment he has received at home that he prefers the foster home to his real one. This is just one of the things that keeps this type of work from being easy.

I have not written these things to discourage anyone from becoming a professional mother but to show both sides of the work. Perhaps you have been

Autumn Meditations

ETHA T. NEHER

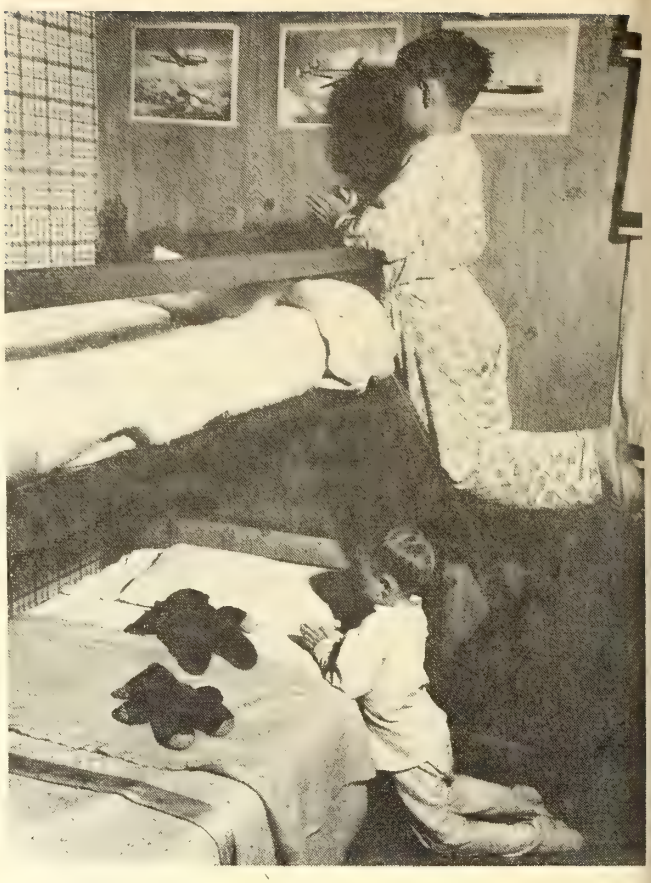
God gave me a gold mint, right by my door;
I look up and thank him, mid color galore.
Here is such beauty it makes my heart throb,
If I open my eyes and just turn the knob.
I need not go far his beauty to see,
For here—thru' my doorway—God gives it to me.

Soon the bright autumn leaves will flutter down,
A patchwork of color—red, yellow and brown;
So in life's patchwork is your thread and mine.
How will we weave it? How spend our time?
We make our choices as days come and go,
'Mid autumn sunshine or winter's snow.

Each soul is an artist—but do not forget,
This is God's world and he rules it yet.
These days are ripe for quiet thought:
"O God, please use the gifts I've brought."

challenged to try this way of earning additional income but feel that it would be too difficult to get children to board. It is true that it is very hard to get children for adoption but to board them is a different matter entirely. There are thousands of children, not up for adoption, who need a boarding home. Perhaps you can furnish one.

If you want to try your hand at being a professional mother you must have extra room in your home, a place where children can play and nerves able to stand the wear and tear of child raising. And you must, of course, have a good reputation, infinite patience and a genuine love for children.



You must also be licensed by the state. Mrs. Guthrie received her license shortly after she began boarding children. She made her application through the welfare agency in the nearest city. The license was sent to her from Columbus, the state capital (Ohio). Her home was not modern at first although she made it so several years later. When requirements became stiffer she was forced to have an outside stairway built to the second floor where the children slept.

You may think that you are too old to try this worth-while work even though you need the money it would bring you. Mrs. Guthrie was fifty-four when she started. Now she is a sixty-nine-year-old grandmother. Only a short time before this was written she had seven children in her home including a baby.

Certainly not everyone can do this work or should do it. But if you need the money, have the room and love children there is no way that you can perform a more needed service than by boarding children in your home. In Ohio the pay is eight dollars per child per week (ten for babies). You must buy food, do the washing, replace worn-out furniture and pay for the extra utilities used. The clothing is to be furnished by the parents, although you will find yourself buying little needed articles that they refuse or neglect to buy. But the good you do cannot be measured in monetary gain.

Sometime ago I spent the night in Mrs. Guthrie's home. There was a new boy there. I was awakened several times by his quiet yet penetrating cry of loneliness and unhappiness. I asked Mrs. Guthrie about him the next morning. I learned that his father had placed the boy with her because the mother had run off with another man, leaving a note that went something like this: "I don't want a thing. You may have everything including the children."

These little ones need much love and care to make up for the raw deal that life has given them. Maybe there is one somewhere that needs your love.

Oftentimes the only religious training some children get is that given in a Christian home opened to children who need homes here was the "best way." and, humanly speaking, it failed. Yet in time, this does not mean defeatism, but work in trust. And this work in trust is based on the sovereignty of a God who rules both time and eternity.

This then is the meaning of eternity for men; that the "against" with which our life is rife shall be removed. The frustration of working for good causes and seeing injustice prevail; the experiencing, perhaps in ourselves, of corrupting pride; at best, in the case of the saints, the incompleteness of our lives, bound as they are by necessity and immersed as they are in nature and its travail—all these "real" things shall become "unreal" in the presence of a God who loves and redeems and shall be all in all. We work in time, remembering that our citizenship is in heaven.

To make mockery of these elemental "facts of faith" by claiming for our own pet human project the will of God is to name oneself a rebel. We would do well to ponder the condition of our own pig sty before we sell out to the romanticism of some noble rebellion. All our lives should be lived in that humble trust which is faith. For God is the Lord, and in him alone can we rest our hope: he who has done his deed in Christ and still works, in spite of our rebellion; in spite of our rebellion against love. For he knows himself, that he is love, and he knows that this will prevail.

This is our faith and this is the basis of our confidence, and to this, fall though we may, we shall hold firm. For though perplexed, we are not in despair; bruised, we are not crushed; wandering, we are not lost; sick, we shall not perish. All this is God's doing, and he has made us, and he waits for our return.

Meet the Master

Mrs. Glen Liebert

YESTERDAY I made the beds, swept the floors, washed the clothes, read my Bible and said a prayer. Yet my soul seemed restless. My life was full and happy yet so filled with meeting the tasks of the day that I had little time left to meet the Master.

Today I met him as I left my bed and beheld the glories of a beautiful sunrise. He said, "This is the day which the Lord has made. Rejoice and be glad in it."

I met him when I greeted the bright, cheerful faces of my children, as they called, "Good morning, Mother." He said, "These are your most treasured possessions. Protect, guide and teach them well for my sake."

I met him when I visited a home where filth and sin abounded—and a baby cried. He said, "Help the sick and the weak. Lift up the fallen."

I met him in the woodland, where I beheld the wonderful creations of my God. He said, "These are things that show your Father's love. Take time to enjoy them."

I met him on a high mountaintop. He said, "Your arms cannot reach me, but your spirit can. Come, lift your mind and heart to higher things."

I met him at the door of my church. He said, "This is my Father's house. Forget all worldly trials and troubles and worship him."

To-night I meet him at the altar in my heart. I say to him, "Not my will, but thine be done."

The Family Counselor

The Family Counselor welcomes letters of inquiry. They may be addressed: Family Life Department, General Brotherhood Board, 22 S. State St., Elgin, Ill.

Dear Counselor,

Would you please say a few words of consolation for parents of teen-agers? I really think our three feel that their parents are a problem to them: we are out-of-date, we don't understand what's going on in the world, our furniture is too shabby—even our 1951 model car is a "crate." We sincerely want to be fair. But are we always in the wrong?

Parents of Teen-agers.

Dear Friend,

I am sure your situation has struck a sympathetic chord in the experience of many past and present parents of teen-agers. We know what you mean.

Just the other day I saw a cartoon I can't refrain from mentioning here. A case history was being obtained of one man by another. Among the questions asked was this one, "Have you ever been considered feebleminded or insane—by anyone other than your own children, that is?"

In the process of growing up, of stretching their wings, of weighing the ideals and practices of home over against those they see outside their home, our children often find us as parents wanting and they tell us so.

One's reaction to these frank appraisals is so important. If you are too sensitive and feel hurt by them, causing "scenes" and strained situations in the family circle; if you respond with a "laying down the law" attitude, thus cutting off frank discussions and confidences; or if you make the children feel wicked when they "let go with" remarks such as you mentioned, there may be real trouble ahead for you.

If, on the other hand, you can look at these outbursts objectively as part of the growing process and be patient, if you can examine squarely the opinions voiced to see what truth there may be in them and act upon it—maybe you do need to do more reading and consulting on the best methods of being parents of youth today; maybe the furniture does need some creative, not necessarily expensive renewal; maybe you need to have a heart-to-heart talk with your children as to why your car is not the latest model—if you can respond with loving understanding that will keep the channels of communication open between you and your teen-agers, there are joyous years ahead for all of you.

I would like to suggest that you and your husband read together the book by W. W. Bauer, Stop Annoying Your Children.

No, you are not always wrong. Rest assured if you grow in understanding, affection and respect for your children, in a few years you will be hearing comments from them that will be as music in your ears, and your hearts will be filled with gratitude to God.

In Remembrance

MILDRED ALLEN JEFFERY

Scarlet roses cascade
Over trellised walls
And porches wide and cool.
But the old, old house
Stands empty and silent
Amidst the stately poplars.

Little grass-covered paths
Circle the grounds,
Winding in and out
Among forsythia
And weed-choked patches
Of ancient flower beds.

The one who planned it all
Has long been away,
But that which remained
Keeps dauntless vigil
In tribute to him
Who loved and cared.

Christians too, keep vigil
For one who has been away
These two thousand years;
They eat the bread,
And drink the cup
Of the Lord's supper,
Remembering . . .
Until he comes.

Many refugees in camps in Germany and Austria look forward to a new home in America; not all are as fortunate as this family who are now in the States

My First Day in America

F. C. Neumann

IT WAS a lovely Saturday evening in April. I started the English Course for Immigrants in the Library of City College, New York. After the scourge of the Swastica in Hitler's Austria, I felt exceedingly happy to find my way back to humanity. The friendly faces of freely moving students and instructors and those thousands of precious books, never burnt or black-listed, inspired me with the entirely new experience of American freedom.

With ten other Austrian immigrants, mostly scholars, I settled at a round table in a quiet, little room. Our instructor, Mr. Goodman, sitting opposite me, was about my age, in the middle forties, brunette, slender, refined. He spoke excellent English and pointed out the fact that "spoken English" meant our future bread. He encouraged us to make short talks, and we immigrants spoke our minds and were happy to speak the first time without any fear of the Gestapo.

After class Mr. Goodman motioned for me to wait and said with breezy frankness," You look very serious, Mr. Neumann. I bet my head you are a heavy-laden family father."

"No, Mr. Goodman," I replied, "I have been single all my life."

Then Mr. Goodman asked, "How long have you been in this country?"

"Precisely ten hours," I answered, looking at my Swiss watch, the only jewelry, the Nazis had left me.

"Don't you feel lonely in a foreign land on the very first day?" asked Mr. Goodman, while his friendly eyes were upon me.

"Oh, no, Mr. Goodman," I said; "I have already made six friends on the very first day."

"How could you?" he asked skeptically. "I haven't made so many friends throughout my whole life."

"While still on the boat," I explained, "I met Miss Liberty, the Mother of Exiles. How enchantingly she rose from the rolling waves. How wonderfully she strengthened my trembling heart." Mr. Goodman smiled sympathetically. "Then after landing," I resumed," at the harbor immigration office, a tidy, elderly lady presented me a brand-new, pocket prayerbook. Another lady, with exquisite small hands, gave me a five-dollar bill for a hotel room. Then I learned about another immigration agency in 42nd Street. Here a pale lady, with thick glasses and a friendly face, gave me two lists. One, she declared, contains the names of reasonably priced rooms around Central Park. The other is a guide to colleges and language schools. Much luck to you, she said with an encouraging smile. "And the last lady, Mr. Goodman, was as kind and beautiful as an angel. She gave me a ten-dollar check and said, That's for your adjustment. Then she added most solicitously, In case you need medical care or new teeth or new heels or new eyeglasses, order them immediately and send me the bill. As long as you are jobless, we want to help you as much as we can. Anything you don't have to pay is like money in the bank, isn't it? And come again whenever you need some help or advice. Behind me were queuing hundreds of immigrants, chalk-white, nervous, half-starved and, like me, they all received help and consolation from this beautiful lady."

Mr. Goodman said, "The ladies have been playing quite a part in your new American life, haven't they?"

"Certainly, Mr. Goodman," I replied, "and it seems to me that these ladies fulfill what the Lady of Liberty promises: Peace and liberty for those who have suffered from persecution."

"And how do you like New York City?" asked Mr. Goodman.

"Oh, it's the most hospitable city in the world and I am the happiest immigrant," I said, and we both laughed.

When I departed, I asked, "Mr. Goodman, what do I owe you for this splendid English course?" "You owe me nothing." Taking my hand in both of his, he said, "All Americans, once immigrants, are now happy people. And when you are settled, you'll be happy too." And it sounded like a promise.

Then I went "home," spending my first American night in a room just big enough to turn around in but it was clean and airy and had a lovely bed with a resilient spring mattress and soft eiderdown blue quilts. The pillowcases bore the initials, M. M., Mary Matthew, my landlady's name. She was about eighty, lace-capped and black clad. With her thin, gaunt figure she looked like a gothic statue from St. Patric Cathedral where she just had attended mass.

Putting a tumbler of milk and a cooky upon my desk, she told me in her hoarse and feeble voice, "I am so happy that you rented my room." Then with her cold, bony fingers she motioned me to get down on my knees. Then she prayed ardently, "Our Father and greatest teacher on earth as in heaven, give comfort and healing to all those who have suffered from persecution. . ." Every wrinkle in her dried-up face beamed and announced that joy and peace of mind that only the pure in heart and the strong in love and faith can achieve. I felt like a child again with my mother teaching me how to pray.

Before falling asleep I thought about my first day in America. I had a prayerbook for worship. I had a place to sleep when I was tired. I could go to the hospital when I was sick. An excellent teacher was going to teach me English. I had good friends and was in possession of fifteen good American dollars. And I had much more, inexpressible in terms of dollars, American democracy. And on the very first day I enjoyed this great privilege. I don't know how your teachers of history and psychology and sociology define American democracy. But for me it was the feeling of absolute equality with any other fellow American.

What other country in this world, may I humbly ask you, would have given me all these privileges on the very first day?

GOD SPEAKS

Glen Weimer

GOD IS ever on the trail of man.
God seeks to unveil the treasure of the human heart.
God speaks to man through the events of history:
the rise and fall of nations;
the breakdown and renewal of culture;
the tensions that terrify and destroy communities;
the grace of goodwill, tolerance, and hard thinking that binds men together and builds community;
the will in man that affirms the life of every other man.
God speaks to man through personal experience:
Blessed is that person who has learned to read the message of God in his own life—in its high and low moments—in its joys and sorrows—in its achievements and failures—in its weakness and strength—in its aspiration and hope.
O God, equip us with the insight to read aright the unfolding of thy word in our own hearts.
God speaks through the mystery, miracle and design of every atom in the universe.
God calls from the temporal to the eternal—from the ever decaying city of man to the abiding city of God—from known truth to the unknown— from discovered right to the undiscovered—from love lived to the unlived—from the attained good to the unattained.

O God, thou art above and beyond us in the life of Christ. Nevertheless, thou dost call us each one to go with Christ on the upward way. Amen.

The Church Takes to the Air

J. Perry Prather

RELIGIOUS leaders have always been among the first to take advantage of the means of communication available in their day. They have used messengers, all forms of writing and publishing and all means of personal presentation as methods for sharing the good news of the gospel.

In our day radio and television have given us new forms of communication that approach the speed of light. They are unlike any other means. Radio is only a voice and makes sense only through the ears. The voice is the thermomenter of the emotions and quickly betrays the speaker's balance or lack of it. The voice is vividly connected with what a person is inside. The reply of the maiden to the cowardly Peter, "Thy voice betrayeth thee," is not idle talk.

The immediate voice is the only contact the radio audience has. There are folks listening who are very religious; others are only moderately religious; still others are antagonistic to everything of a religious nature. Most of the radio audience has never finished high school, and the program and the speaking must be keyed to the common folk. Jesus spoke in very simple words and the common people heard him gladly. People will pay attention only as long as they want to. The art of good radio broadcasting is to help them want to listen. The conversational style with its intimate ways is what a radio audience desires.

The beginning of a program is of paramount importance. The audience must be won from the start. The first thirty seconds usually set the nature of the program and either invite or repel the audience. Listeners will not wait long for a program to become interesting. Programs will be criticized. Those that rate highest on the air waves have been most mindful of audience reactions. On the air the voice of the broadcaster may seem like the "voice of one crying in the wilderness." Everything that is said is presented to one specific person (maybe a half dozen at the most), and human interest is the interest he has.

Radio listeners enjoy hearing a person radiate happiness and goodwill. A smile gives the voice clearer and more distinct force. It brings the lips into play and helps give the voice the flexibility it needs. No manufacturer, desiring to have the public use his product, would ever go on the air with regrets that his product is not better than it is. The church has the gospel to share, and it is good news to all who will listen. A good program informs, creates wholesome attitudes and inspires the listener to Christian action. A good program will reach nonreligious people and unconcerned.

The foregoing few suggestions have been gleaned from more than 300 programs and are given as simple suggestions to improve and help any one to improve radio programs when called upon to participate. Television has a vast advantage over the radio, and it is here to stay. To the voice is added sight, drama, pathos and a million thrills that affect the viewers.

Today religion reaches out by radio, TV and pictures, and the churches are able to speak to vast new congregations never before dreamed of. These new media of communication have opened up new worlds. These are rough times and men are likely to lose faith in the shaky structures they have built for themselves. Out of the present hour, the church has discovered new tools that God has provided to carry his Word to the multitudes. Jesus sent the disciples out into the highways and hedges—into the homes too—and now for the first time in the history of Christianity, the gospel is being carried back into the home and highways and the Great Commission is literally being obeyed in carrying the gospel into all the world, preaching to every creature.

The church has come late to the use of this mass-communication technique for bringing the Word of God to millions, at a time when they stand sorely in need of power to live a victorious life. Billy Graham's weekly broadcast, This Is the Hour of Decision; Dr. Ralph W. Sockman's National Radio Pulpit; Dr. and Mrs. Norman Vincent Peale's What's Your Trouble?; Dr. Dale Oldham's Brotherhood Hour; Rev. Peter Eldersveld's Back to God Hour; and Bishop Fulton J. Sheen's popular TV program, Life Is Worth Living (to name only a few) touch the hearts of millions over radio and TV. Were it possible, the church should match every radio and TV program put on by the tobacco and liquor interests. It would make a difference, for religion still touches the heart and soul of mankind. What would St. Paul do with the modern media? We can only guess when we know what he did do, traveling on foot and over stormy seas.

Brethren who have come late are just beginning to awaken to the vast fields "that are white unto the harvest." Does it pay to spend money for radio and TV programs? That is a foolish question to ask. If it did not pay, the tobacco, liquor and a thousand other interests would not spend the money they are spending. They check sales and demands. They get the best talent that money can buy. I believe we have a better product. A talk over the radio presented the need for heifers for Europe. Soon a check came from a university group for $1,250. At another time after learning of the desperate needs for the flood-stricken peoples of Hollond, one nonreligious person turned over to Brethren Service a check for $100. The only contact she had ever had with the Brethren Service program was the writer's Religion in the News weekly broadcast on Sunday mornings on KWWL, now in its fifth year. In a survey of the country and village parsonages by Drew University, Madison, N. J., a single reference was made to a pamphlet with the complete report, giving the name of the pamphlet and the address. The university sent a telegram asking that the price of the pamphlet be given since their limited budget could not carry the heavy requests for the pamphlet.

It takes time to build up a following, just as it takes time to build a church. The Back to God Hour in its first year over just one station mailed out only 622 copies of the radio sermons delivered during the year. After seven years, the requests had risen to 500,000 copies for the year. Now the service is heard on 330 stations, with close to 2,000,000 requests for the radio sermons delivered, or 40,000 per week. Dr. Dale Oldham's Brotherhood Hour started small, and now it has a national hook-up and amply paying its own way. The same is true of Bishop Sheen's TV program, until today almost everybody in America knows him. This Is the Life program produced by the Lutherans and now heard over 235 radio and TV stations is the project of the Rev. Herman W. Gockel, who lost his voice while preaching on Palm Sunday in 1938. It is a thrilling story of a minister who would not give up. All the TV and radio religious programs like his are preached to the 64,000,000 unchurched among the other millions that listen and view.

The conclusion of the matter is simply this. God has given the church a most wonderful opportunity in radio and TV to reach his children with faith, hope and love. We can help the person who feels as if the sun has already set upon his life. We can help the daring youth of today, who need Jesus Christ as Lord. We can use it to awaken interest in the Bible and its quality and power to change life. Each new generation makes some transforming discovery in God's world. Radio and TV seem to be ours. We can tell the world that "God so loved the world that he gave his only Son, that whosoever believes in him should not perish but have everlasting life."

New Instruments for Peace

Rachel Garner

IN GERMANY the day for material aid is not finished, but we as Americans must shift to more needy parts of the world with direct help in clothing and food. In Germany, we have assisted the refugees and bombed-out peoples for the past seven years. Two distinct classes are coming forth: one the very rich and the other the very poor. Little has been done to educate the Germans on accepting the responsibility of taking care of their own people. The German organizations become restless in their chairs when we suggest we will be helping less next year. They have a right to, for we have come in, given freely, but have not encouraged the German people enough to give themselves.

A country struggling out from under the ruins of a second war has by nature become selfish. I talked to one of the leaders here in Kassel and the comment was, "I give nothing away unless it is rags and then I use those to make heat in my stove. When another war comes to our land, I want to be prepared." Can one ever be ready materially?

We need to come up with a kind of program now which stresses ideas and emotions that unite people, their love for home and family, for children and animals, the beauty of nature and for courage and skill in doing those things which improve man's common lot on earth and help him, his government and mine.

Hitler worked closely with the youth of Germany. In work camps, we rub shoulders with youth who were active in the Hitler Youth. They tell us again and again that they looked forward to the day when they could become a leader. All kinds of medals were pinned on them for achievements. Hitler's program bound the country together for a short period of time. We need to help build in the mind of the youth of today, the middle-aged and the old people, a kind of faith in a living Christianity that will not crumble in a few years but will keep us all bound together for an eternity.

Mothers with children in refugee camps have little chance with their children. As a result of a recent survey, which we made with the Mennonites, figures prove that the longer people are in a refugee camp, the larger the families. Think of the thousands of children with all the potentials for good, playing in dump heaps and stoning one another as an outlet for excess energy. Somehow you young people in America must feel the seriousness of this need along with us! With a little direction, a child can remove himself, in his imagination, from the four walls of his so-called home, to new fields. If we had crayons, tempera paints, water colors and chalk for a volunteer to take with him as he goes into the different camps to act as a guide and counsellor, he could provide encouragement and inspiration. If the volunteer was there when needed to assist in helping the child say what he wanted to say with brush or chalk, lives could be changed.

A little boy drew a flower and beside the flower he drew a rough sketch of himself. After he had finished he looked up and said, "Me picking flowers." His work included his feeling and thought and the teacher in this case, said to him, "God made you and the flower too." The child, full of ideas and fearless in his approach, naturally had put God in his drawing too. Although this child had little concept of God, he was open for ideas and eager to listen.

Children in one area who spent most of their time throwing stones at one another now are being encouraged to decorate them with fanciful colors to match their unusual shapes or when they discover one with unusual colors to save it to polish. Children no longer are throwing stones but now the stones have a new meaning. Stone polishing equipment could become a means of stimulating international friendship. One little boy asked, "If I do a good job on polishing my stone, could I send it to America or Greece and exchange it for a stone from that country?" Many children are being encouraged to turn an ear toward a rock pile and hear the stones begging to be turned into something beautiful.

All people color their perceptives with optimism, fear or hope. They usually see the things that they are involved in at the moment much larger than the important things of life that they consider insignificant. We all see things differently. We must encourage families to see hope beyond four walls of a crowded room. It is our job to help them develop positive ideas.

The well-known children's story here in Germany, Strubble Peter, was given at the Stadt Halle in Kassel. One little girl in particular who was very shy was inspired by what she had seen. She came home and immediately went to work and made a very outstanding puppet. This was admired with enthusiasm by the other children in the class bringing to the little girl a feeling of pride and confidence in her ability to do something different and worth while. I visited this class and while I was there, I asked one little boy what he would like to make. He said he would like to make something that would help him to feel the peace and quiet his mother had always talked about that was so real in her native Poland. Four colors of clay was all that he needed to help him feel and see the beauty he had heard so much about. His finished product was a very quaint looking little farm with animals, a house, barn, and trees. With the blue clay, he had made a crooked little line that was a stream running past the house. When he had finished he looked up and shyly smiling asked, "Does it make you feel all quiet inside?"

If one little boy could feel this way, think what a hundred pounds of each color of clay might do to many children. The last time that I visited the group, they had made up a complete story of a little Arab boy and become quite Arab minded. If only all of us could become interested in other peoples as these small children have become. German children are made to learn in the schools, but we must help them realize that they have ideas and can find satisfaction in expressing them.

Mothers come to sewing classes because of a need to mingle with other women and because of a need for clothing for the family. This type of thing is very new in Germany. An East Zone mother does not always feel too comfortable with a group of West Germans. It is difficult for them to find a common working, talking level. Even though sewing and discussion groups are slow, they are beginning.

The mothers comment on the colors we wear and the colors we have in our homes. It would mean so much to the German girls and mothers, if in addition to sewing machines and sewing materials, there could be added textile paints, silk screening and Dekall for glass. It adds color to their lives and dark rooms.

A wood carver from behind the Iron Curtain escaped, was processed through camp after camp and finally was given a place to live with his family. The state gives him $32 a month. From that he pays for food and rent and buys clothing (if any are ever bought). He showed us proudly some of his wood carvings that he brought with him from his home land. Here it is not possible to buy wood because it is so expensive. We took him some of the wood that had been sent to us from the scrap piles at Berea College. He then presented us with a Slavian doll that has all the personality and character that is possible to put into a wooden figure.

There is no person who does not cherish his country and its traditions and customs. A strong bond exists between all people in the origin of tradition, varied as the reasons may be. This man has the possibilities of becoming a self-respecting refugee and to produce wood carvings of his homeland that are salable, but there is no wood. How many of us are burning wood that would make good wood carving material and blocks for children to play with in our Kinderheims?

We must become receptive to other cultures and choose what we feel is best. Perhaps out of this can merge some new harmonious patterns which shall be both valuable to the individual and international co-operation. Crafts are a new potential instrument for peace which has never been adequately used. As we see idle hands, we cannot afford to neglect them.

Reviews of Recent Books

Books are reviewed here as a service to the church. A review does not necessarily constitute an unqualified recommendation. Purchase can be made through the Brethren Publishing House, Elgin, Illinois. Titles recommended for church libraries are marked with an asterisk (*).—Editor.

How Christian Parents Face Family Problems. J. C. Wynn. Westminster, 1955. 144 pages. $2.50.

It would be impossible for a book of this length to show how Christian parents can solve all—or even most—of their family problems. Yet a surprising amount of specific guidance on specific questions has been included. Four chapters deal with special concerns of parents: interpreting sex to children; helping the handicapped child; facing up to mixed marriages; walking alone as the result of divorce or death.

Far more important than formulas for successful parenthood are the attitudes of parents themselves. The author believes strongly in the force of example. He emphasizes the need of parents to recognize their own limitations, to discipline themselves, to seek spiritual guidance, to watch their own stewardship—before they can cope with family situations involving budgets, daily worship and the ever-recurring problems of discipline. At the same time the author being himself the father of three small children, knows to what extent parents need sympathetic guidance rather than criticism.

Few books for parents are so thoroughly Christian. Every chapter gives evidence that the writer, an ordained Presbyterian minister and director of the Christian family program of his church, views parenthood as a Christian calling, for which parents need not only good books like this one but the grace of God itself.—Kenneth I. Morse.

In Spirit and in Truth. W. L. Howse. Revell, 1955. 96 pages. $1.50.

This little book contains a hundred outlines of devotional worship programs. It would be very helpful to the Sunday-School superintendent of a small school, the worship leader in CBYF, of men's or women's work meetings. The material is simple, the hymns familiar, the ideas good. — Edward K. Ziegler, Roanoke, Va.

Bridgewater College

Three faculty members have been promoted as the college opens the 1955-56 session: Lowell V. Heisey from associate professor of chemistry to full professor; Warren E. Groff from assistant professor of Bible to associate professor; and William Willoughby from sociology to professor of philosophy and head of that department.

President Warren D. Bowman has announced new faculty members: Calvin C. Berlin of Ohio as assistant professor of history; L. S. Shively of Indiana as interim professor of mathematics; and M. Ellsworth Kyger of the class of 1942 as assistant professor of modern languages. Wm. E. Barnett, rural sociologist from North Carolina, will be assistant professor of sociology; C. Orman Spivey of Indiana, instructor in music; Berchie Hodum of Mississippi, instructor in home economics; and Mrs. C. E. May, Bridgewater, instructor in commerce.

Other staff appointments are Bonnie Kitchen, Hagerstown, Md., college nurse; Paul Phibbs, Pulaski, Va., superintendent of buildings and grounds; and Mrs. Vivian Turner, Roanoke, Va., as a director of residence.

The first meetings of the faculty were held on Sept. 14. A joint student leader-faculty planning conference was held at Row's cabin on Sept. 14-15. Freshmen came to the campus on Sept. 15 for several days of orientation before upper classmen arrived. The regular session of classes began on Sept. 21. All resident facilities are filled.

Total gifts for the ten-year development program for the year ended June 30 amounted to $168,670.33. Of this amount 1215 alumni and students are credited with gifts of $103,721.81. Gifts earmarked for the new health and physical education building amounted to $118,611.77. Since the beginning of the ten-year development program in 1950 a total of $591,999.51 has been received in gifts. The goal for the decade is $1,400,000.

A firm friend of the college passed away with the death of Bro. Jesse E. Rolston of the class of 1889, late of Sheldon, Iowa. Bro. Rolston's latest contribution was a gift of one thousand dollars for scholarship purposes given last spring.

The college has received $17,484.42 from the estate of the late Virginia Garber Cole Strickler, who died in the summer of 1953. A total of approximately $30,000 is anticipated from her estate in accordance with provisions in her will. This fund will be known as the Virginia Garber Cole Strickler Memorial Fund to be used as endowment for scholarship purposes. With additional contributions from other sources it is hoped that this fund will reach an ultimate value of $50,000. Mrs. Strickler was a trustee of the college for many years and had given in her lifetime the college auditorium, beautiful Cole Hall.

John Jacob Myers of the Mill Creek congregation is providing a four-hundred dollar annual scholarship for a youth interested in a full-time church vocation. It is available for the 1955-56 session.

News and Comment From Around the World

Congress Investigates Sales of "Religious Junk"

A Congressional investigation of the "religious junk" racket promoted by dealers who mail unsolicited religious articles to American householders with a request for payment or contributions will be conducted in the fall. At least two big mail order operators in the Miami, Florida, area dealing in religious junk have had to cease their operations following the investigations of postal inspectors. These operators had been netting twenty-five cents to one dollar on articles worth only a few cents.

American Pastor Gives Communion to Russian Christians

Dr. Theodore F. Adams of Richmond, Va., president of the Baptist World Alliance, administered communion to Russian worshipers at a Moscow Baptist church. It was believed to be the first time since the Bolshevik Revolution that an American Protestant clergyman had officiated at a communion service for Russians in the Soviet Union. Reports said some 2,500 persons jammed into the church which has a congregation of approximately 5,000 but can accommodate only half that number at one time.

President Signs Bill Aiding Church Mailings

President Eisenhower has signed legislation allowing churches and religious organizations to enter their publications as second class mail without having to maintain separate subscription and membership lists. Under a previous law, church organizations were required to obtain a signed statement from their members that a part of their contributions should be regarded as a subscription to the periodical. The new law will particularly benefit churches which maintain parish bulletins. Such bulletins can now be entered as second class matter.

YMCA Celebrates Centenary of World Organization

Some 10,000 delegates and visitors gathered in Paris for a series of conferences marking the 100th anniversary of the World's Alliance of YMCAs. They represented 4,000,000 members of YMCA groups in seventy countries. Dr. Paul Limbert of Geneva, Switzerland, general secretary of the World's Alliance, said that YMCAs have been suppressed in nine Communist countries of western Europe since World War II but are still functioning in Communist China although the latter have severed their connections with the international organization. Another spokesman said the YMCA had gone underground in Spain since the advent of the Franco government.

Lutherans Number More Than Seven Million

Membership in Lutheran churches of the United States and Canada exceeded seven million in 1954, a new high, according to the annual statistical summary compiled by the National Lutheran Council. This was an increase of 3.6 per cent over the previous year. The average gain during the past five years has been about three per cent.

Churches Escape Destruction in Floods

Churches generally escaped destruction in the nation's worst floods which smashed dozens of communities in six Northeastern states. While some churches in the devastated areas were badly damaged by silt and water, there were relatively few instances of structural damage. Church camps suffered heavy damages but campers were evacuated without loss of life or serious injury. In practically all of the devastated areas churches were immediately organized as relief centers for flood victims. They provided shelter for those whose homes had been washed away, dispensed food and medical supplies and served as stations for typhus vaccine inoculations.

Bibles will be made available to stricken families and churuches in the flooded areas. The American Bible Society said that requests would be handled by local clergymen who would forward them to its headquarters.

Mennonites Brand Racial Segregation a "Sin"

A statement branding racial segregation as a sin directly countering all that the Bible teaches has been approved by the biennial General Conference of the Mennonite church —the nation's largest Mennonite body. The statement called upon all institutions of the Mennonite church to end any segregation they may be practicing and to "make meaningful" the denomination's "doctrine of nonresistance which professes love for all men."

Seventy Countries Have W.C.T.U. Groups

The World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union now has national auxiliary organizations in seventy countries outside the Iron Curtain. The figure was reported to the eighty-first annual convention of the National W.C.T.U. held at Long Beach, Calif. Delegates approved a nation-wide Christian Citizenship Crusade among both adults and youth. This will include a widely expanded program of alcohol education and the production of visual aids for both high and grade schools.

Quakers to Aid Objectors to Loyalty Oath

Conscientious objectors to a loyalty oath in Illinois and an air raid drill in New York will receive legal aid from the American Friends Service Committee. The Quaker agency announced it will assist twenty New Yorkers arrested for refusing to take shelter during an air raid drill last June and twelve persons in Illinois who lost their jobs after declining to sign a state loyalty oath. The money will come from a $150,000 grant to the Quaker group from the Fund for the Republic to finance a two-year program to strengthen freedom of conscience.

Disciples Seek to Recruit Men as Sunday-school Teachers

Most men have failed to carry their share of responsibility for fostering Christian growth in children. This is the contention of Donald Scott, director of children's work for Disciples churches in Kentucky. He urged churches to launch a movement to get more men teachers in church schools.

According to Mr. Scott, men teachers have certain advantages over women: First, men are dressed more for teaching. Boys and girls cannot tolerate a woman wearing a hat all the time. They think she is ready to leave. Second, the mere presence of a man usually assures discipline. Third, men are more handy with mechanical things.

Methodist Youth Leaders Ask Halt to A-Bomb Tests

The National Conference of Methodist Youth sent a telegram to President Eisenhower asking for an immediate halt to the making and testing of nuclear weapons. The conference also adopted resolutions saying Christianity and war are incompatible, opposing universal military training and asking Congress to repeal the recently enacted military service bill. The delegates said it is the obligation of "every Christian to oppose the way of war and to identify himself with those forces, national and international, which truly seek peace."

Contest on Hymns on Christian Citizenship

The Hymn Society of America has announced a contest for one or more new hymn texts to be used in connection with National Youth Week next Jan. 29—Feb. 6. The contest is being conducted at the request of the United Christian Youth Movement. It is open to young people under thirty. A deadline for submitting entries is Dec. 1.

National Council Sends Data to Business Groups

The National Council of Churches has furnished detailed data on its leadership, program and financing to some 3,000 chambers of commerce, better business bureaus and civic organizations over the country. This pioneering step was taken because "the need for an adequate screening process for charitable appeals to commerce and industry is becoming daily more apparent." The report indicated that the council has a paid staff of 682 persons and also is served by 5,500 volunteers who receive no expense allowances.

News Briefs

The Evangelical United Brethren Church has launched a $5,000,000 four-year United Crusade for its colleges, seminaries and church extension in new areas. Part of the money raised will be used to establish churches in new housing areas and is expected to help make possible a $26,000,000 denominational building program.

The first volume of a new four-volume "Mennonite Encyclopedia" is off the press and will be made available to the public on Nov. 1. The encyclopedia will contain some 10,000 separate articles from 500 contributors in America and Europe. The remaining three volumes will appear during the next three years.

The Wife of Evangelist Billy Sunday has released motion picture rights for the Billy Sunday Story. She has authorized a religious film company to make the movie on her famous husband's life. She said at a news conference that she would give her share of the proceeds to charity.

The 75,000 members of the Mennonite Church gave an average per capita gift of $30 for missions and relief in the fiscal year that closed on April 1. This made a total of more than $2,200,000.

Quotes in the News

Charles B. Templeton, noted evangelist: "A knowledge of the Christian faith provides the background for life's fundamental choices. It equips people to live in these tumultous times in relative serenity and increasing usefulness. It makes possible social progress, for democracy depends upon a free and informed people."

Ralph W. Sockman: "Religion has become the great vogue in the United States but a vogue is not enough. Our best hope of a religious revival is through the pew rather than the pulpit. We have not enough preachers . . . We must count on laymen to do the evangelizing."

Nelson Chappel, general secretary of the World Council of Christian Education: "Every parent is a teacher of religion or irreligion . . . not so much by the formal religious observances such as grace at table, family worship, etc.; although these are important. But these formal observances will have meaning only as . . . the informal training through the attitudes and actions of parents and other members of the family support the formal witness."

Eduardo Mondlane, son of an African tribal chieftain, speaking to a Convocation of Methodist youth: "Whites own eighty-three per cent of the productive land in the Union of South Africa and control all of its business and government. Natives are pushed around like sheep and forbidden to vote or to organize labor unions. The sense of revenge is natural and inevitable."

Mrs. H. F. Powell, national W.C.T.U. treasurer: "While atom bombs litter our highways of democracy, the State Department uses thousands of dollars of taxpayers' money to buy presentation liquor for the use of its diplomats and foreign representatives."

Dr. Henry Alexander Murray, professor of clinical psychology at Harvard University: "People don't talk about serious religous problems very often. They are more embarrassed to talk about their religious ideas than about their own sexual autobiographies. Sex used to be the forbidden area; now religion is the forbidden area."

In Every Land a Friend

Franklin wrote, "When befriended, remember it. When you befriend, forget it"

Doris Walbridge

DURING my eighteen months of service as a volunteer in Kassel, Germany, I witnessed every day the many ways in which the Brethren Service Commission befriended people—people who had lost so much as a result of war—people who received a renewal of hope in humanity and faith in Christianity when told this was being done in the name of Christ by his followers whom he taught, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, soul, mind, and strength and thy neighbor as thyself."

The Brethren Service workers received great joy in helping their German brothers and the deed they did was quickly forgotten, but the things which could not be erased from their memories was the plight these people were in.

This friendship which was evidenced in Germany certainly was not one-sided, for it seemed to me that the German people went out of their way to make the American volunteers feel at home in their country. They realized that most of us were going to be away from our families for two years. I shall never forget the wonderful hospitality which was shown to me personally. Six families especially extended such a welcome hand to me that I felt I could drop in on them at any time and be taken in as part of the family.

First of all, I lived for two months with the Reichelt family in Hofgeismar, a little town fifteen miles outside of Kassel. They were refugees and before the war had been well-to-do people but had to leave all their possessions behind when they fled their homeland of Silesia. But by the happiness which was present in this home, one would never know of the tragedy they had endured in the past. This family—the parents, two girls, grandmother and uncle—took me in and called me their daughter. The oldest girl, Margarete, was an exchange student in the States, having come over with the first group in 1949. She lived with Mr. and Mrs. Max Murray of near Roanoke, Va.

The other families in whose homes I spent much time were: Mr. and Mrs. Windisch and their daughter Susanne, who was a secretary for the Brethren Service Commission and worked in the same office with me; another Brethren Service secretary, Helga Apsen, her sister, mother and her grandmother who looked like the pictures of my grandmother whom I never knew; the Kohlstaedt family whose two sons attended the first youth meetings held at Brethren Service and helped to build Brethren House and whose third son was lost in the war; the Weisbord family, father, mother, and daughter—all three school teachers—with whom I became acquainted through the daughter, Ilse, who was my German teacher; and last, but certainly not least, the Mai family, consisting of the mother and five daughters. They also were the "family" of an American volunteer.

Not only in Germany did I find friends but also in other countries. After completing my service term I stayed in Europe an extra month to travel. During this time I visited the homes of several youth who had participated in Brethren Service work camps. Each place I went, whether it was the Cricco or Tacchini homes in Carrara, Italy, the Celia Lascaridou family in Athens, Greece, or the Petersen home in Copenhagen, Denmark (whose daughter is a volunteer in the States now), I was made welcome on every occasion.

There will always remain with me the memory of these friends and a deep appreciation that I was privileged to know them. The spirit I have seen in the lives of these people has taught me that in the heart of everyone there is a desire for peace and good will and that the people of all races and nationalities can be friends.

I Will Lift Up My Eyes

Vivian Blough and Norma Switzer

HOW many times this verse, "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills from whence cometh my help," comes to our minds to comfort and sustain us when we are discouraged and forget to look up.

The reformatory at Alderson is completely surrounded by beautiful hills—covered with pure white snow in the winter, gorgeous wild flowers in the spring and summer and ablaze with color in the fall as the leaves change from green to gold, red and orange.

Our hills are a beautiful and uplifting sight all the year round—a great contrast to the human wreckage and degradation here within the confines of the reformatory!

How horrible to think that the wonderful gift of life and the sweetness of a newborn baby, instead of growing straight and tall like a pine, is becoming stunted and twisted, because of a lack of parental love and moral training.

Take Joan for an example. She is a teen-ager and, physically, quite a lovely girl. Her parents separated when she was a child. As she grew older, Joan was given very little supervision and never had an opportunity to know what a real home was like. The results: at a very young age, Joan married a man who later became a bank robber. After he was sentenced to prison, Joan bought a gun at a pawnshop and smuggled it to her husband in prison. He is now awaiting the electric chair after shooting to death a patrolman and Joan is serving here at Alderson.

We also have many "girls" like Jean Cook, who is a middle-aged woman. Jean is one of many who are here because of the use and sale of narcotics. Here again, the prisoner comes from a broken home where she was given little love, affection or security. At fifteen Jean was supporting herself. In 1945 she married a drug addict and later both Jean and her husband were sentenced to institutions on drug addiction charges.

Not only the young make mistakes. Here is Ann Sherwin, who is sixty-six years old, with a very confused life history. Her mother died when Ann was quite young. When her father remarried, she left home and at once got in with the wrong crowd. Since then she has served several prison terms on charges of drunkenness and disorderly conduct.

These are only three out of six hundred girls with whom we work here at Alderson. We try to give them an insight to a greater and happier life, both by example and through our conversations with them.

Many of these girls are striving for happiness and trying to find it in earthly pleasures. Too many times we who profess Christianity are also guilty of this sin, though we may not be punished while we are here on earth, or condemned in any way by others, because we choose more socially acceptable ways of seeking happiness.

How many of us must have a new outfit of clothes before we can go to church, yet never think of how we are prepared inside for our Master? How many of us will be weighed in the balance and found wanting?

Does Christ really come first in our lives? Let us lift up our eyes unto the hills from whence comes our help and ask sincerely that we may be guided from our selfish seeking into a true communion with God.

The authors are giving a year to Brethren Volunteer Service at the Women's Federal Reformatory at Alderson, W. Va.

A Church Has a Stewardship

H. Spenser Minnich

LIFE is a trust. A person is trustee of what he possesses, time, ability and material assets.

A congregation is also a trustee of possessions. Her most valuable asset is not realty but personality, boys, girls, men and women. The church fulfills her trusteeship when she teaches and nurtures her members in all things according to the spirit of Christ. "Have this mind among yourselves, which you have in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 2:5, R.S.V.). The Church of the Brethren is now placing more attention on Christian giving than ever in her history. Tithing and proportionate giving are normally based on current income.

The church also speaks on Christian stewardship with respect to possessions accumulated over the span of life. They are acquired by hard work, saving, wise investment, inheritance or fortunate circumstance. Annual Conference in 1954 adopted a statement calling on members in making wills to express their faith by remembering the church and asking ministers and teachers to uphold deep spiritual motives in the distribution of accumulated possessions. The full statement appears in a free leaflet, Wealth in Heaven.

Suggestions and materials for local church use have been supplied to pastors and superintendents. They are available to others upon request. The material includes three outlines for discussion. These are intended for use in classes, forums or in a school of stewardship. One of the outlines is presented here.

Intestate, or without a will, is heard often when some friend dies. Then the court steps in, appoints an administrator and distributes the assets according to state law. The question arises, "Does such distribution fully reflect the purpose of the one who has gone on?"

Many people are so busy living and accumulating possessions that making a will to provide for its distribution is neglected. Unfamiliarity with procedure causes some to delay until it is too late in making a will. A three-page letter on will making is available without charge. To secure it, ask for I Will, a bulletin with news, information, ideas about wills and special gifts, available from the General Brotherhood Board, 22 S. State St., Elgin, Ill.

Stewardship of Accumulated Possessions

For use in discussion. The leader may turn the statements given here into questions.

A Personal Matter

Philosophy

Life is a trust from God, to be used for God and returned to God.

Man is given dominion over creation.

Dominion means a purpose beyond self.

Christ asks followers to dedicate all of life and follow him.

Trusteeship is expressed by: (a) giving while living; (b) giving in the final distribution of accumulated possessions over which the Christian is trustee.

Policy

To learn the will of God.

A Congregational Concern

Philosophy

The church has a concern for her members and a teaching responsibility for all areas of life.

A man's life may be impoverished, depending on his attitude toward material things. The church has a duty to give a Christian viewpoint in the distribution of accumulated possessions.

Policy

The church is to develop wholesome attitudes on stewardship expressed in wills.

Program

The program will be largely educational.

It will cultivate stewardship principles. Since teach-

To be alert to human need, within and beyond the family. Also to be aware of the church, her agencies and their programs.

To respond in appropriate ways when the divine will is apparent.

To produce, use and conserve and distribute as would a faithful trustee of a trust.

Program

It will look toward distribution at life's ending or earlier.

Instruments such as joint deeds, insurance policies, trusts, etc., are useful.

A will is basic for full and final distribution.

Procedure

Make a will NOW: "Too late" is a tragic word when death comes suddenly or senility unfits a well-intentioned person for making a will.

A Christian should make a Christian will. When is a will Christian? When its maker has sincerely and intelligently sought and followed the will of God with respect to loved ones and the Christian cause.

A will should be reviewed in the light of changing conditions within the family, in assets and as new light comes from the divine will.

ing about giving is so traditionally related to current income, the program will seek to include the thought of giving from accumulated assets.

The program will employ procedures that are acceptable and promise to be fruitful.

Procedures

Teaching from the pulpit.

Teaching in the classes.

Schools of finance in which wills and related subjects are considered by lectures and discussions.

Distribution of literature.

Audio-visual helps.

YOU NEED THE CHURCH

YOU need the church because it is the body of Christ and your best means of fellowship with your Lord on earth.

You need the church that you may warm your heart at the spiritual fires of its altar and bask your soul in enriching Christian fellowship.

You need the church to help you be aware that you are just one of a great company seeking to worship and serve the Christ. A close fellowship within the church family strengthens its members' living.

You need the church that you may be so deeply rooted that life's severest storms will never fell you.

You need the church as the best channel for you to express your love and concern for the needy people in every nation—through Christian sharing of prayer, money, time and ability.

You need the church as an outlet for your energies for making a better world by making a better community, and making a better community by making a better person—of yourself!

You need the church also to help in the training of character of your little ones, in the molding of wholesome habits and worthy aims.

You need the church that you may carry out our Lord's great request: "To go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature."

You need the church that you may have a sacred place to consecrate your little children, to solemnize the holy bond of matrimony, to bring you an immortal faith that helps to fill the emptiness of heart you feel as loved ones are laid to rest.

You need the church to celebrate the lilting season of Christmas and the deathless joy of Easter and give you renewed vision every week as you commune with God.

You need the church to give you a taste of heaven here and now and prepare for you eternal joy.

You need the church that you may be a whole man "furnished to all good works."

You need the church because it is the body of Christ and in it you have fellowship with God and carry out the Father's will for your life.

Mature Years is the title of a new periodical published quarterly by the Methodist Church for older people. Mature Years is a magazine for all mature adults whether they are shut-in, active, retired or working.

This magazine which has just completed one year of publication includes articles dealing with everyday living, travel, adult adventures, inspiration and a section devoted to the international Sunday-school lessons and daily meditations.

An outstanding feature of this new publication is the larger type which is used in the printing. This makes it very easily read. Older people in the Church of the Brethren would find much enjoyment through reading this paper as a supplement to the Gospel Messenger. Subscriptions may be sent to the Brethren Publishing House, 16-24 S. State St., Elgin, Ill. $1.50 per year.

THE CHURCH IN ECUADOR

IN FEBRUARY of this year the thirty baptized believers at the Brethren mission in Ecuador organized themselves into a congregation. For their moderator they selected a lay brother, Luis Osorio, a man of zeal and considerable ability. The meeting place at present is the chapel of the school building, but both the missionaries and the congregation feel the need of a church building, and negotiations are under way for the purchase of a building site.

They have Sunday school and preaching each Sunday morning. On Tuesday evening a Bible study class for literates meets at the Rhoades home. While we were there this class was studying the Gospel of John. On Thursday evening Benton conducts a baptismal class in the home of an Indian family. In this class there are twelve to fifteen, mainly some who have come forward in the meeting and indicated their desire to be baptized. On Saturday afternoon there is a prayer meeting at the school, attended mainly by illiterates. In conjunction with Paul Striech of the United Andean Indian Mission, Benton has also been conducting a leadership training class once a month. Paul gives instruction in conducting a worship service and Benton in preaching. Several young men show an interest in learning to preach.

The adult Sunday-school class has been studying the Book of Acts. The people are quick to make comparison's between Paul's missionary journeys and the work of our people who have come to Ecuador. Someone remarked that Paul did not come into a community, build a home and stay ten years. Thus is raised among the native converts themselves the question of when the church should become indigenous, that is, self-directing and independent of foreign missionary influence. The aim of the missionaries has always been to have the church stand on its own feet as soon as possible. But there are problems involved, and we are reminded that the Great Commission is not only to "make disciples" but also to "teach them all things I have commanded you."

An Indian convert, Pedro Tasiguano, had been licensed to the ministry and installed as pastor with partial support. His sermons were clear and forceful and the missionaries had high hopes for what he might become. Then he was found to be living in sin and was immediately deposed from his office. His failure was a great blow both to the church and to the foreign workers. Adultery is so common in the community as to pass almost without comment. It is a good commendation for the growing sensitiveness of the believers, therefore, that they should react as they did to this sin in their midst. The missionaries feel now that the church should not for a time attempt any supported ministry but depend on self-supporting lay ministers in the former Brethren tradition.

No picture of the Ecuadorian church is complete without reference to the race problem. There are two classes of people in the rural areas of Ecuador, Indians and mestizos, or mixed Spanish and Indian. The mestizos call themselves whites and the class consciousness amounts virtually to a caste system. The distinction is not one of color and it is difficult for a newcomer to tell which is which.

The work of our mission was directed toward the Indians. When whites applied for membership they were cautioned that this would involve acceptance and practice of racial equality. What problems this may create in the future is not now foreseeable. Tasiguano is an Indian. Osorio is a white. The membership is about equally divided between the two groups. When they had a love feast recently and Benton explained the feet-washing service, Brother Osorio suggested that in seating they alternate Indians and whites so that each might wash the feet of one of another race.

Twice a month they have communion following the morning preaching service. One Sunday during our visit, as a preparatory lesson, Benton read the story of Cornelius and Peter. He called attention to the fact that there were three classes present—whites, Indians and foreigners—and that none could really commune if they rejected any other. To me it was a most impressive service. Christ's body was broken and his blood was shed for these poorest illiterates as well as for us who call ourselves cultured. These who have so far to go yet are among those of whom Christ said, "I am come that they may have life and have it abundantly."

Quechua Evangelistic Services

In May our mission had the good fortune to have as our guest Rev. Peter Fleming, from the Plymouth Brethren mission, who works among the Indians of the jungles. Bro. Fleming preached in the native Indian language of Quechua. He and Benton Rhoades visited much in the entire community, held daily chapel services in the school and at night preached to a goodly group of Indian neighbors and friends. Although no adults openly took a stand for Christ, we feel that the hearts of many parents were softened to the extent that they will not impede their children as they make the decision to follow Christ.

Decision Week in the School

A short time before the special evangelistic meetings, the older students of the school were invited to have private conferences with Benton Rhoades and our school director and his wife, Juan and Matilde Benalcazar. They talked over the meaning of church membership and any students wishing to make a decision for Christ were encouraged to do so; some children have held back because of opposition at home. Four school children are studying in the prebaptismal class at present.

Weaving Classes Begun

Two hand looms have been given to the mission by an interested American businessman of Quito and classes have been started in weaving. Matilde Benalcazar studied in the Point Four weaving center at Otavalo and now is helping instruct folks from our community. It is our hope that another loom or two will soon be available and that the economic level of our Indian neighbors can thus be raised as they gradually learn to weave pretty shawls, tablecloths, bedspreads, cotton and woolen cloth.

First Sixth-grade Graduation

July 24 was a big day in the history of our mission school when six boys, two of whom were among the first five little boys who dared to enroll in the evangelical school when it opened six years ago, graduated from the sixth grade. Each year a new grade has been added to the school and now we have a complete primary school, there being only six grades in the primary school system of Ecuador. It was a busy day of oral examinations for every child, the director of education for this province being a special guest and the one who examined the graduates for two hours. Our school was highly praised by the examiners and later all the boys of the sixth grade who took the entrance exams for high school in Quito received good grades, although many boys from country schools failed. Much credit is due our school director, Juan Benalcazar, and his capable wife, Matilde, for the high scholastic standard of our school.

Church Organizes

Following the pattern set up by the Association of National Evangelical Churches here in Ecuador our church formally organized, with pastor, two elders and two deaconesses all elected by the church body. It is the hope of the church that we can soon become members of this association, thus uniting our church with the churches of other missions throughout the country. An impressive consecration service for the new officers was held, led by a missionary from the HCJB radio station in Quito. Our church has established a building fund which is growing, to purchase land and build a church.

Practical Nurse Joins Mission Staff

Since July 15 we have been very happy to have Señorita Elva with us, who has taken over the medical work temporarily in the absence of Faye Koontz. Elva is an Ecuadorian girl, with experience as doctor's office girl for several years and is helping in a wonderful way in caring for the sick of our community; we are thankful for her Christian witness to all who come for medical help. The medical work continues to fill a great need among the people of our community.

Chickens Given to School Children

As a part of the 4-F Club project, four hens and one rooster of good imported New Hampshire stock, were given to each club member and a few chickens given to each school child, both boys and girls. Each child had to provide a suitable shelter for the chickens and many are buying good feed from the mission agriculturalist, Rolland Flory. In this way we hope to see a better type of chicken developed in our community. One schoolboy has the idea of earning money for high school by going into the chicken business.

Ira Frantz Family Visits Ecuador

This summer brought us the privilege of a six weeks' visit from the Ira Frantz family of North Manchester, Indiana. Many folks who come to visit spend too short a time to get a good picture of our entire program and, therefore, we were happy for this lengthy visit of the Frantzes, who are the parents of Ruby Rhoades. We know that they will help us greatly in presenting their impressions of our mission to the church at home.

Monroeville Church Dedicated

Floyd Mallott, Jr.

THE Monroeville Church of the Brethren held its dedication services on Sept. 18, at 2:30 p.m. Bro. T. F. Henry was the dedication speaker. Bro. Henry also spoke at the morning service which was followed by a church dinner. Following the dedication of the church and parsonage a tea was held at the parsonage.

Along with many cities Pittsburgh is experiencing a dispersal to the suburban areas. The completion of the Penn-Lincoln Parkway joining with U.S. route 22 opened the eastern part of Allegheny County. At the intersection with the Pennsylvania Turnpike, is Monroeville Borough, the gateway to Pittsburgh. In this community was the first old "post house" east of Fort Pitt. Old farm land, much of it strip mined, became a booming suburban area with a present population of 17,000 people destined to be 50,000 in ten years by present prediction.

Bro. W. H. Shumaker saw the need for a church in this area and deeded two lots to the mission board of Western Pennsylvania. Under the direction of the mission board, Bro. W. J. Hamilton, mission organizer, came to Monroeville and on the first Sunday of June 1952, services were held at the old William Penn auction barn. Five weeks later, July 6, the new church site and ground-breaking services were held. By that fall, the first unit—a basement—was completed, now the recreation unit.

Local families plus a few families who came from a distance worked with Bro. Hamilton solidifying the group and planning toward a more adequate building. Much toil, prayer and work with the Brotherhood Board about a building took place.

On June 1, 1954, Bro. W. Dean Crouse came as a first full-time pastor. The membership as of June 1, 1954, was fourteen. The building was started in July 1954 on the present structure. That fall the church was organized and officially became a part of the District of Western Pennsylvania at the district meeting at Somerset. As of this writing there are sixty members with many other families attending regularly. A number of families are presently enrolled in a membership class taught by Bro. Crouse.

The first love feast was held in the spring of 1954. Last Easter-tide we held love feast with forty-five in attendance. Our attendance has been averaging approximately eighty-five per Sunday.

The building, which was dedicated on Sept. 18, has been the major preoccupation of the group for the past year. Also we have been laboring to perfect the organizational problems. The sanctuary was first used by the local congregation the first Sunday of June 1955, three years after the first service was held in the auction barn. One hundred thirty were present for the service, which was followed by a fellowship dinner for 105. Mere statistics cannot tell the story of the growth of the fellowship in this New Testament church.

secrated in special services. In observance of home and family week, the Homebuilders class presented the play, The House on a Rock. This class also gave the same play in four neighboring churches. Our church was host to the district young married people's banquet with William Wilboughby of Bridgewater as guest speaker. Bro. Glenn Crist of Mt. Hermon and Bro. Kermit Flora of Dayton were recent guest speakers at our Sunday morning services. Parker Leffue and Joseph Ferguson represented our church at Annual Conference. They both gave reports of the Conference. Bible school convened June 26—July 2, with a program on Sunday night. The Homebuilders class recently painted the church basement and the men's work group painted the church roof. New hymnals were recently dedicated. Our congregation was host to the district conference July 26-28. Bro. Wilmer Crummett served as presiding moderator and guest speakers for the meeting were Charles Zunkel of Elgin, Ill. and Jacob Dick, who recently returned from Europe, having served with Brethren Service there. — Mrs. Levi T. Angle, Rocky Mount, Va.

Spray—Sixteen have been baptized into our fellowship and one received by letter. Our elder, W. C. Sweitzer, was delegate to Annual Conference. We had a Bible school. Albert Nyce of Vernsfield, Pa., and Dick Simmons of Toledo, Ohio, youth caravanners, worked in our church during the past summer. Bro. Ray Showalter of Bridgewater held our revival in July. As a result eight persons were baptized and one received by letter into our church. Bro. Enos Griffith was licensed to the ministry. Albert Nyce represented our church at the regional conference at Bridgewater. — Mrs. Ersley Odell, Spray, N. C.

First West Virginia

Petersburg—Since our last report Bro. Abram Eshelman of Mt. Joy, Pa., held a two-week meeting. As a result four were received into the church by baptism and two by letter. At the close of our two-week vacation Bible school, the children gave a program on Sunday morning. Mrs. Helen Slaubaugh of Kingwood, W. Va., district women's work president, gave a talk at one of our regular meetings. A number of other churches were represented at this meeting. The women also sent clothing for relief and sent several seed packages. Several of our women attended the workshop at Bridgewater, Va., and the rally at the Old Furnace church. Our church was host to the four-in-one conference. The men are working on our building project, which consists of additional Sunday-school rooms. — Grace A. Shreve, Petersburg, W. Va.

Sandy Creek, Laurel Glen—This church is on the border of the Terra Alta and Sandy Creek churches. Nearly all hold their membership in the Sandy Creek congregation and for many years brethren from that congregation, Elders Jere Thomas, George VanSickle, Joseph Guthrie, Taylor Sines and others, preached at or near Cranesville. Several living in the vicinity entered the church and remained faithful, though for a number of years there were no preaching in this neighborhood. About the year 1941, the writer began holding services here. Then after a few years they began holding vacation Bible school each summer which was very successful. During the last fifteen years there have been thirty-three members received by baptism. Last year Sandy Creek took over the work and at the close of the school there was a love feast and forty or more communed in the school house. A strong desire grew to have a house of worship. At a council it was decided to build a church. Then a brother gave the church nearly one and a half acre for a church lot. The basement is dug out and nearly half of the footer poured and all but one load of the blocks for the basement are on the ground. People of the vicinity are subscribing liberally to the work but they are still in need of much. They are planning to build a cement block house. They again had their vacation Bible school led by Bro. Eugene Matthews, assisted by about four other teachers. At the last session seventy-two were present.—Emra T. Fike, Terra Alta, W. Va.

Religious Advertising

As I passed through a small Iowa town I saw a miniature "Little Brown Church" sitting beside the highway advertising the real "Little Brown Church" of which we sing. This set my mind thinking on religious things, especially of religious advertising.

The Mennonite Church people have a standard billboard publicity plan which quickly announces that there are Mennonites in a community.

Commercial men spend some eight billions of dollars annually publicizing their wares, goods and services. Now I wonder how many dollars Christians spend annually publicizing Christianity's virtues and truths? It certainly would be money well spent for the Church of the Brethren if they like the Mennonites would start a plan to use billboards to publicize our church and Christianity. All over the northwest I see billboards announcing "beer from the land of the sky blue waters" and cigarettes via, "Be happy, go lucky," etc. So why not "Be happy, live right," "Bad Habits Burden People," "Overcome Evil With Goodness" (Church of the Brethren). I, therefore, urge the officials of the Church of the Brethren to start a department of religious visual publicity.

I just passed a religious outdoor advertising poster. It had so much reading on it I could make out only about half of what it said at sixty miles per hour and now I can only recall that it was a religious poster. I believe five words are a maximum to use on outside posters.

Publicity is removing the basket from over our religious candle so that all men can see and read twenty-four hours daily, year in and year out.—A Traveling Man.

Accentuate the Youth Program

The article by Julian Griggs (July 30) and in Readers Write by Lloyd Hagg (Aug. 20) and recently D. O. Schechter combine to voice a call for accentuated youth program for community youth directed by Church of the Brethren sponsorship. These calls reflect the national attention being given to youth needs in American life. Professor Bagwell of Michigan State College reminded us that probably the future's major problem, of which we are at present most unaware, is strength of the youth life soon to be coming on the American scene.

This tide of youth life will live in a society where factory machines operated by machines ("automation") make decreasing call for human hands—youth will be admitted to employment later than now. More people will live in cities than on the land. All this spells—more youth with more leisure time than now. City youth envy rural youth because rural youth have "more worth-while things to do." A youth group asked to list teen-age problems listed the "lack of anything worthwhile to do." The 4-H clubs, F.F.A., F.H.A., Boy Scouts, Girl Scouts and to some measure athletics fill in this vacuum with worthwhile activities which make these youth groups the pride of America, while the unguided segment of our youth give us a crime record that is the shame of America. The difference between the two groups lies in the concern of the adult sponsors who pilot—the pride of America—and the unconcern of adults who could but don't, do anything about or for our undirected youth.

Junior Achievement is a movement to help youth get experience in business investments, business management, etc. It may offer patterns for youth participation in playground building, roadside park arrangement and care, civic participation in hospital assistance. Youth are saying, "Give us something worth-while to do." At present only the military seems interested in finding an answer.

Juvenile courts need more parole and probation officers. Let's encourage Brethren people to do Brethren Volunteer Service in this field.

A judge of the probate court said, "Our greatest problem is to find the right kind of homes for children who are wards of the court." These are not delinquents, merely children needing help. Brethren homemakers who can guide children without tension should consider the role of foster parent as a form of Brethren Volunteer Service.

I should like to learn through Readers Write or Messenger mention what Junior Achievement is doing in your community, or what the best youth worker in your area is doing for youth where you live. This exchange of ideas will stimulate wider thinking.—Galen Barkdoll, Copemish, Mich.

Religion was ineffective in Germany because the church was remote from the everyday lives of the people

The Church in Germany

Part I

Harry K. Zeller, Jr.

THE German church is the oldest thing in Protestantism. The Reformation began in Germany. Germany except for Bavaria, a province which is stanchly Catholic, is, and has been, the most strongly Protestant country in the world. In West Germany about sixty per cent of the people are Protestant. East Germany, the heart land of Protestantism behind the Iron Curtain, the land of Martin Luther, Halle, Erfurt, Wartburg, is eighty-five per cent Protestant.

The Reformation which began in Germany was followed by thirty years of religious wars. In Germany, where they take everything seriously, they take their religion seriously too. People thought enough of their religion to struggle to the death for it. For thirty brutal bitter years they fought to determine whether Germany would go Protestant or Catholic. Finally in the Augsburg Peace, which came at the end of those thirty years of war, a formula was devised which is the standard term among church historians, curius regio, eius religio", which means "the religion of the government shall be the religion of the people." In that early time when Germany was made up of 300 princely states it seemed the sensible solution to a tough problem to say that the prince or ruler of any state would determine the religion practiced in that state. Each state would have one type of religion and the citizens could elect that religion or emigrate to some other place.

The church needed the princely rulers. Martin Luther had no bishops, for he had broken from the line of succession from Rome. He suggested that the princely rulers appoint the bishops and the princely rulers in their turn required that the people be obedient to the government in all matters relating to the state.

In the evolutions and revolutions of time two things took place. First, the 300 princely states began to merge. By the time of Bismark they had been almost merged into one, although not quite integrated. The Weimar Republic momentarily brought the German nation into unity, but never effectively so. Now Germany is two lands. The Church of the Land (Landes Kirche) began to incorporate the little groups into the larger groups. All the tiny threads of tradition running back to 300 separate organizations have gradually been brought into three main Protestant groups: (1) The Lutheran Church, (2) The Reformed Church and (3) The United

Services are held in the Kaiser Wilhelm Memorial Evangelical church in West Berlin whenever the weather permits. Badly damaged during the war, the church will be rebuilt and the architects of Germany are submitting designs for reconstruction

Church. These three are brought together in a loose federation known as the Evangelical Church of Germany. Bishop Otto Dibelius of Dahlem is the presiding official.

The Germans are long on tradition. If any more complicated structure for the church could be found the German would find it! Our conversations with church officials, such as Dr. Krimm of Hilfswerk or Pastor Powlowski of Johanneswerk, would inevitably begin with an observation something like this, "To understand our organization you must go back in church history 450 years . . ." The effort to retain the old organizational pattern in the new geographical structure, like new wine poured into old wineskins, has not quite worked out successfully.

A second thing also happened, more significant than the first: the church became identified with the state. The church had its finger in the keeping of the records. Thus one was literally born into the church. The church became co-extensive with the geographical area and embraced all people in that area whether they wanted to be members of the church or not. It is difficult for the German to understand that in America the church is a voluntary association of persons who become members of the church because they want to become members of the church. In Germany virtually all the people are official members of the church, but usually have little contact with it. In Germany, the only way to be a nonmember of the church is to go to court, stand up and swear you are an atheist. Your name is then stricken from the church rolls—and your name is taken off the tax rolls.

To my surprise, I discovered that the official church in Germany was not in a bad way financially. Most church leaders are not inclined to stress the point, or even acknowledge it, but it was clear to us that the tax income—amounting from forty to sixty per cent of the total church revenues in the separate land areas—makes it possible for the church to continue as a rather stable financial institution in the community. This money goes primarily to the maintenance and upkeep of the huge churches, but some of it is used for the payment of preachers' salaries.

This official status of the church not only includes compulsory membership and taxation, but also the appointment by the church of an official representative to every department of government to see that the Protestant concerns are taken care of. The big struggle in the German church right now concerns its willingness to sever these preferential ties. Martin Niemöller and a few others are saying that the church in Germany will never really live until it cuts its strings with the state. Most of the confessional wing (that party in all three Protestant churches which was in vocal opposition to Adolph Hitler) adheres to the position that the church must say to the people, "You become a member of this church when you want to by your own commitment to Christ. You give to this church, not as you give your taxes, but as you make a freewill offering."

The problem of shifting from a state church to a free church is not as simple as it seems to be. For example, many people in Germany argue for the necessity of the church tax, not for the maintenance of the active church, but on the basis that the huge churches and cathedrals—built as much as 500 years ago—are public monuments!

No figure of speech could more adequately represent the role of the church to the majority of the people of Germany in the last three decades. The church, because of its official connection, was removed from the people. It was abstract in its theology and remote in its relationships to the daily business of life. Its bishops and officials had high protocol status at diplomatic and community functions. Its pulpit was way up in the air—not down on the level of the people. Its pastors served a large official membership and the church was a status institution, rather than a service unit in the life of the people.

In short, religion became ineffective as it took on official status. When Hitler came along with the creed of nihilism—the

The Baptism We Need

ALL the gospel records give vivid testimony to the presence of God's Spirit at the baptism of Jesus. If there had been any previous uncertainty as to God's relationship to his beloved Son, it vanished in the blinding assurance that God was already with him and would remain.

To live a life pleasing to God requires more than water baptism; it demands a baptism of the Holy Spirit. To be moved, not by the stresses and strains of every day's circumstances, but by "one holy passion filling all my frame," a child of God must experience the baptism of "the heaven-descended dove," as George Croly's great hymn so aptly phrases it.

If Jesus needed the constant assurance of God's Holy Spirit, how much more do we. Not only in the refreshing and cleansing experience of baptism but in the midst of each day's conflicting claims upon our time and loyalties we need to be made aware of God's presence. Then with confidence in a power greater than our own we will be prepared to face the peculiar temptations that confront us in the wilderness of modern life. Since our temptations are not notably different from those of Jesus, we ought to prepare ourselves with the same kind of baptism that gave him the victory over temptation.

We are all sons of God—but such prodigals that we waste the generous substance of his material gifts and even the splendid spiritual inheritance that is ours. But prodigals are ever welcomed home by the Father if they come to their senses and discover the meaning of living as dutiful children of God. To repent, to be baptized both of water and the Spirit, and to live each day with God as Guide and Friend—in such ways we too become "well-beloved" sons. —K.M.

What Kind of Civil Defense?

WHY is it that the average American citizen cannot become excited about plans and organizations for civil defense? He is certainly aware of the possibility of destruction in the bombing of any of our large cities. He must realize that some adequate planning is necessary to meet any threat of disaster. Yet few people seem concerned about proposed air-raid drills, evacuation plans, shelters or other civil defense plans.

The reason may be that average Americans are indifferent to talk about dangers that they have not directly experienced. But we are not so irresponsible that we would "fiddle while Rome burns." It is more likely that Americans regard most of the civil defense proposals as unrealistic about what would happen if one of our cities was actually bombed. The shelters would not shelter. The evacuation schemes would not evacuate many persons in the few moments between warning and attack. Even the survivors must contend with the effects of radioactive fall-out.

There is another reason why many Christians are less than enthusiastic about civil defense proposals. Nearly all the organized plans assume an attack by an "enemy" whose identity is fairly well established. Though civil defense is considered often as a local operation, it is inevitably connected with a type of national defense that looks on a stockpile of bombs, on overseas bases and on a large military system as the foundation for any defense. To Christians who know the working of the military mind, the current civil defense plans seem designed more as ways of creating fear and distrust of other nations than as honest measures for meeting disaster. The kind of publicity given to civil defense often bears out this suspicion. Actually the results of air-raid drills may be damaging to morale because they create a spirit of fear, hatred and frustration.

What, then, should be the attitude of Christians toward civil defense? Many will co-operate, but without enthusiasm, in whatever plans their community chooses. Others may refuse to go along even with what appear to be sensible measures. May we suggest that churches begin now, apart from any organized civil defense requests, to study ways of meeting any kind of disaster, whether caused by floods, fire, drought, storm or some kind of conflict? Churches that have always responded to appeals for material aid could be ready to respond practically and sacrificially to any human need in their neighborhoods. But let the emphasis be on relieving suffering, not on spotting planes, detecting "enemies," or getting out of town more quickly than anyone else.

Above all, the churches must preach their message of reconciling love and redemption. They must insist that the only defense against war is to prevent it and they must make more clear than ever their faith in a Christ who is the prince of peace, in a God who is their refuge and strength and in a way of life that takes away the occasion for all wars.—K.M.

Numbered Among the Transgressors

Ora Huston

As many letters as are permitted and visitors every visiting day will help a CO in prison to feel he is remembered

Religious News Service

CLIFTON CAMPBELL is in prison. His number is 5296. Clifton is a member of the Church of the Brethren. He was sent to prison because he lived up to the teachings of the church. He studied the New Testament, believed it and obeyed it. He was ordered to report for induction into the armed forces and refused. His conscience would not allow him to take part in the war program. He purposed to save, not destroy human life and property.

Clifton was late in reaching this decision but is firm and true in it. In spite of all of his efforts and those of his friends and counselors, he could not get the 1-O clasification. In good conscience he could not accept service in the armed forces. He was, therefore, tried and sentenced. He is now numbered with the transgressors.

Director of social action, Brethren Service Commission, General Brotherhood Board

The physical conditions in a federal prison are not bad. They are better than many people have in their own homes. Food, shelter and clothing are adequate. The beds and the buildings are clean and sanitary. Food is wholesome and nourishing, but the variety is not great. It tends to run to starches. Most prisoners gain weight while they are in prison.

Psychological factors are a different matter. The prisoner is deprived of the normal and frequent choices which he makes in civilian life. Most of his decisions are made for him. This condition is generally degrading to personality whether in prison or out. In prison it is especially harmful.

Most prisoners feel that they are forgotten. Time moves slowly and letters are few. When a prisoner feels that he is remembered, he thinks that he is looked down upon by society in general and frequently by his friends and acquaintances. He becomes a number. He is counted to see that he has not escaped. Being locked in, he feels that he is treated as an animal. This, too, is degrading to human personality.

Environmental circumstances are also different. In prison we find people who have lived below the law of the land, as well as those who have lived above it. There are all kinds of criminals, murderers, thieves, forgers, dope fiends, sexual perverts, etc. There are also some of our finest people in prison. Some are victims of ignorance, discrimination, injustice. Others are there because they lived according to the message and teachings of Jesus Christ. The prisoner finds that his associates are much like the people outside of prison. Perhaps a larger proportion of

In spite of the above-mentioned facts, many conscientious objectors in prison are more free than conscientious objectors who have taken some other course contrary to their conscience. Freedom is not the right to do what you want to do, but the power to do right.

Many conscientious objectors grow while they are in prison. Most of them have the good solid foundation needed for wholesome growth. Some grow intellectually as they pursue correspondence courses. Many grow socially as they learn to understand and appreciate human personality. Growth of character comes by being true to the best and finest they know. God can be nearer in prison than anywhere else on earth. Many, but not all, have grown spiritually.

Every conscientious objector denied the 1-O position has a tough decision to make. Will he place the things of God first and take the consequences, or will he compromise and serve the dictates of the government? Most of us have not had that decision to make.

Many factors enter into the decision: How great is one's faith? How strong is his conviction? Has he had experiences in going against public opinion before? What support does he have from his home? What is the position his local church takes on going to prison? How does the girl friend feel about this position? Is God real in the life of the individual? All of these are factors. The greatest factor of all is whether a person puts God first or the state first? It was the question Peter faced. Every person who has taken the name Christian has had to face it directly or indirectly. Our CO's face it in a very realistic way.

The home has a great deal to do with these decisions as they are made. Frequently a mother writes to her son who is wrestling with the problem and includes this statement or something like it: "Whatever happens don't go to prison." Really the mother probably does not mean it that way, for she is saying, "Commit any sin but stay out of prison." There are cases when such a request written or verbal has changed the course the young man has taken. Sometimes they give up in the struggle because they do not have the support of their parents for the position that is right.

At times, because of the pressure of the family, the young man yields and accepts armed services. He is very unhappy all during his period of service, as any person is who violates his conscience and does the thing that he feels to be wrong. It may be even more than unhappiness. He may doubt the Christian faith and belief of his parents. Sometimes he gives up his own faith because of the compromises he has made. Such are the results of the forces exerted on him by his home and close relatives.

Another factor in this tough decision a young man has to make is the response of the church. What is the position of the church while the decision is being made? Are conscientious objectors upheld in prayer, in counsel and in fellowship? After the decision has been made and a man has been sent to prison, what is the reaction of the church? The early church met in long sessions of prayer, both day and night, for their members who were true and imprisoned because of their faith. Sometimes wives and babies are left without support. A number of the churches today have responded by furnishing support to dependents of those who have been sent to prison. Visitation and letters are very helpful, even though these are limited by regulations. Any conscientious objector who is in prison should have every visiting hour filled, and every permissible letter sent.

Finally the time will come when the prison sentence is over. Generally CO's are paroled after one third of the sentence is served. If not, they get out on good time after two thirds of the sentence is served. Then the conscientious objector returns to his home. The response of the church can be tremendous in his readjustment, his future service to the church and his future contribution to God's program.

Throughout the history of the Christian church, there have come testing times when it was well to be numbered with the transgressors. In the early Christian church, the apostles and disciples did not think it strange that people should be sent to prison. The reverse was almost true. It was strange not to be in prison for one's faith. The same situation has occurred at many times in the history of the Christian church. It is recurring today. Is your faith great enough to be numbered with the transgressors because you are living up to the spirit and teachings of God's work? Are you supporting those who do?

Born Again

G. K. Satvedi

HOW can we understand Jesus Christ and the purpose of his life and death in the world? Why have missionary activities been carried out so eagerly throughout the world? The only answer is that God so loved the world that he gave his Son that people may be born again with new life.

When God created the world and all that is in it, he also created man. This man was not and is not a common creation like the rest, but he was created after God's own image. God breathed his image and likeness into man through his Holy Spirit and made him a responsible person who could dominate the world and share with God in responsibility and service. This means that God has a purpose for every individual.

When a man wants to build a house, he has a plan or a picture of the whole in his mind. He outlines the place for windows and doors. He figures out the amount of bricks, stone, wood, cement and glass in order that everything can fit into its place and serve its purpose. Even the smallest item has its proper place and value. So is the place of man in this world. No man is worthless and useless in the program and plan of God.

We do not know how long the first man served this purpose faithfully. We know he rebelled and brought death to himself, that he lost the image and likeness of God. He lost his purity, wisdom and life. Yet it was still in God's plan that he could show his love which is the aim and center of every item in the universe. This is proved in the Bible.

A smart workman repairs any damage and puts everything in order again. So God through Jesus wanted to give mankind eternal life and partnership, since man could not regain it by his own merit.

Nicodemus was an outstanding religious man, a learned teacher and counselor, a wealthy and honorable ruler. He had all the qualifications that a worthy leader could have. But without being born again in Jesus, his qualifications still kept him in a miserable state.

Listen to the words of our Lord. "Thou shalt not see the kingdom of God unless thou art born again." What a discouragement to a man like this! What will it profit a man, if he gains the whole world and loses his life? Or what shall a man give in exchange for his life? Nicodemus wonders at this statement. He eagerly asks, "Lord, how can this be? Is it a birth again in this world?"

Note how the Lord disposes of the idea of the transmigration of souls. Flesh is flesh, it can never become a spirit. Unless the breath of the Holy Spirit breathes in you, you cannot enter the kingdom of God. After giving the idea in general, the Lord points his finger to Nicodemus and says, "You must be born again." You who are pastors, deacons, laymen, rich and poor, all persons of any position, must be born again with water, with fire and with the Holy Spirit.

How can this be? It is really very easy. Forget your own goodness which is like dirty rags, ask Jesus to renew you, and he will do it. Your part is to take him as your personal Savior, be baptized in the water, bury the old life, become a witness to the world. Jesus' part is to baptize us with the fire that will burn out the old sinful nature and give birth to the kingdom of God through the breathing of the Holy Spirit. Jesus did not come to give religion, he came to give life.

Many do not see the kingdom of God because their eyes have been blinded. They take Jesus as a mere man, a good teacher and philosopher. Unless one is willing to understand, the Holy Spirit cannot do anything for him. As long as he rests on his own merit, he cannot see the beauty of God's love and glory. He cannot understand the mystery of the grace of God. He cannot have the vision of life now or the life to come. Many live and die in such darkness. They cannot enter into the kingdom of God because they have no king to help them. They have no power to withstand temptations. They have no heritage, no glory, no employment, no authority, no blessing, no gift, no enjoyment of the presence of God, no entrance into the everlasting glory and joy. Their share is to be with their leader — Satan — unquenchable fire, through all eternity. What a pity to live without God! What an ignorance to neglect the wonderful love of God.

The sign of being born again requires no miraculous experience. It may be a silent growing as the wind works. A person's life itself is proof as it becomes different from before. Now one seeks the will of God through prayer and works according to the light he gets. He feels that he is a co-worker with God, and must give his share faithfully. No difficulty changes his faith. His interest is in the salvation of man. He wants to make the world happy and better. Jesus becomes the example, foundation and fountain of his life. Such an attitude becomes the proof of his new birth.

Let us remember that God loves every one, even the most dreadful sinner, and that God sent Jesus as an atonement to pay the price of the sin of the world. The present time is the last day of opportunity to be saved. To neglect the light of light is to choose eternal wrath of God. Jesus says, "Come unto me and I will give you rest" and a new birth.

On the Plains of "Oh, No!"

J. Richard Gottshall

TRAVELING on U.S. highway 22 east of Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, you go by the village of Ono. Every time I go by the village its name reminds me of the story connected with another Ono, this one in the Book of Nehemiah. Nehemiah was rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem—a very important undertaking. There were some hecklers and some opposition, and they were forever trying to have Nehemiah come out on the Plains of Ono for a conference. No doubt they had some good-sounding arguments too. Actually they wanted to retard the work of rebuilding. But Nehemiah never yielded. He never went out on the plains of Ono and as a result he was able to accomplish much through personal direction of the work and inspiration to his people.

Many are living on the "Plains of Oh, No." Consider, for example, the following:

"Will you come to church this Sunday?" "Oh, no, not this Sunday."

"Will you accept Christ today, become a Christian while the Spirit is calling you?" "Oh, no, not today, maybe some time later on."

"Will you serve on this committee or help sing in this chorus or teach this class or take this responsibility?" "Oh, no, I can't do that, I'm not qualified; you better get some one else."

"Here is the Biblical practice of stewardship of material things—10% for the Lord's work. Are you practicing it in your home?" "Oh, no, we have so many financial obligations we just can't afford to give the Lord his share," or, "Oh, no, that seems like too much to give."

"Here is a challenge to enlarge our services to Christ and the community, to provide adequately for teaching Christianity to our children." "Oh, no, that will cost too much money," or, "Oh, no, we had better wait and see what the future is going to be," or "Oh, no, we don't need anything more than we have."

As long as we stay out on the "Plains of Oh, No" we'll never share in the inspiration and joy of Christian fellowship or have salvation or experience joy and growth in Christian service or the inner satisfaction of partnership with God; neither will we accomplish anything for God, our community, our children. Of course, the job Nehemiah set out to do was impossible. But Nehemiah stayed on the wall, stuck to the job with devotion. This was God's calling and opportunity. He stayed off the "Plains of Ono." Oh, yes, the wall was rebuilt in record time. When we care for the important things first, then seemingly impossible tasks are accomplished with dispatch.

To Do a Mighty Work

Glen Weimer

GOD IS the Artist Workman.
God is still forming humanity—bringing the materials of life into noble expression.
God is still setting man to the tasks that make man man.
God is calling everyone to work he has for him to do.
Ongoing history is a sign of God's patience and expectancy.
God unfailingly uses all the threads of human experience for great ends. When man learns to follow the hand of God in its work, he lives in hopes and assurance. Losing this vision of God, man grovels in despair.
God has put man in the world to do a mighty work—
Man is called to make everything he does point to God:
Man is assigned the task of carrying forward the divine plan.
All work that benefits, beautifies, purifies, enriches, enobles, and gladdens human life is sacred;
All work that feeds the mind with truth and order—the body with health-giving food—the emotions with love and goodwill—and the imagination with beauty is divinely ordained;
All work that lightens the burden of living and that lifts man's eyes to the mystery and miracle of the stars is of God;
All work that channels the redemptive powers of God to human hearts is of divine appointment.
God wants to stand within the framework of our daily toil. And it is within our choice to let the face of God shine through or to raise a barrier against man's seeing God.
Life and work can count for God or speak against Him.
God wants to leave his mark on the world through the work of your life.

O God, thou hast shown thy face in the life and work of Christ. Fashion in me the will to live in the spirit of his life. Amen.

Dear Mr. Congressman--
Are You Listening?

Franklin Wallick

IS IT worth while writing a letter to your Congressman? How many times have you read a newspaper or listened to a news broadcast and wondered in the back of your mind about writing your congressman? Perhaps you said to yourself," What's the use? The congressmen don't worry about what one person thinks; they only bend to the will of pressure groups." Maybe you did write your letter to Washington and found to your disgust that you got a mimeographed letter in reply.

Since the first of 1955 it has been my job to help a big city congressman answer his letters, so I know a little how congressmen feel about their mail.

I work for a Milwaukee Democrat, Henry S. Reuss—a young, intelligent man who helped run the Marshall Plan and plunged into politics in his home town because he had deep convictions about America's moral leadership in a troubled world.

Mr. Reuss looks at his mail the first thing when he arrives in his office in the morning. And unless the mail is heavier than usual, he has dictated a reply to every letter in the morning's mail before he leaves for the floor of congress. Mr. Reuss feels that letters from home are his best link to the people he is trying to represent in Washington.

Sometimes a letter asks for some complicated information and some researching on the part of his staff. In this case the congressman sends out an acknowledgement and a more detailed letter follows in a few days.

One type of letter which irritates all congresmen is the letter which threatens or oversimplifies an issue. Unfortunately much of the mail on the issue of peacetime conscription has fallen into this category, and it is my feeling that a reason why the Reserve bill in the 84th Congress had such tough sledding, is that much of the mail on this issue failed to get out of the realm of generalities, instead of explaining in concrete language what was right or wrong with the Reserve bill.

In fairness to those who have fought conscription measures in Congress, it must be said that many of the draft bills have been extraordinarily complicated and will often change overnight. The average citizen back in his home community is totally unaware of these changes and can have only general convictions about a certain type of legislation.

There are many bills which require the Congressman's vote for which he gets no mail from home. In this case the congressman must depend entirely on what he personally knows about a bill. Or he may ask another congressman whose judgement he trusts on how to vote.

Generally speaking, however, a congressman is most impressed (regardless of his own personal views or even the way he eventually votes) by a calm, well-reasoned letter which does not browbeat him and which shows sincerity.

Congressman Reuss received many letters from PTA groups and parents urging him to do something about school construction. So many of these letters arrived and the committee which handled these bills procrastinated so much, the congressman finally asked for the privilege to testify in person before the committee. Before running for Congress, Mr. Reuss had been a member of the Milwaukee school board, so he was well-equipped to make his presentation.

This is a case where letters from home did much good. Day after day we got letters from worried parents which urged Congress to do something quick about overcrowded classrooms and underpaid teachers. The letters from the congressman's office would say he was fully in sympathy with federal aid for school construction, but it soon became apparent that more action was needed and that is when Mr. Reuss decided to go before the House Labor and Education Committee with a strong statement urging a bill to be sent to the floor of Congress to cope with this urgent question.

Many congressmen nowadays are not content to depend on their mail. They send out questionnaires either to a sampling of their district or to all of their constituents. This is a very helpful guide to citizen thinking.

Congressman Reuss experimented with this questionnaire technique and found great encouragement from the results. His poll was sent to 5,000 people in a cross-section of the congressional district (as recommended by some public opinion experts in Wisconsin universities). Over twenty per cent replied, showing a high percentage of interest. The biggest group of those answering the questionnaire said they were most worried about the possibility of another war (in reply to a question on what worried people the most).

This widespread concern about the drift toward atomic war proved a shot in the arm to Congressman Reuss' interest in a constructive foreign policy. Earlier in the year Congressman Reuss joined with other freshmen Democrats in urging President Eisenhower to take steps to break the deadlock in the cold war by reducing tensions in world trouble spots. This discussion on the floor of Congress pledged bipartisan support to President Eisenhower for any positive moves made to establish peaceful relations with other nations.

Summing it up, here are some simple rules (based on my personal experience in a congressional office) which will make your letters to a congressman get the attention you seek:

Stay away from broad and sweeping generalizations. Give personal examples to illustrate your point, or examples relat-

The Family Counselor

Naomi Will H. K. Zeller, Jr. Jesse Ziegler

The Family Counselor welcomes letters of inquiry. They may be addressed: Family Life Department, General Brotherhood Board, 22 S. State St., Elgin, Ill.

It has not seemed wise to print the incoming communication, but the following suggestions are being made for the problem signed by A Worried Wife and Mother.

Dear Friend,

You married for better or worse—and this seems worse than you anticipated. You are to be commended for continuing to love your husband, though your communication makes it quite clear that this love has little physical expression.

Incest has been taboo in virtually every society known to man—pagan and primitive. This is one of the first limitations on sexual relationships. It is quite clearly prohibited by the higher standards of Christianity. There can be little doubt that the members of your family are aware of these facts.

You are putting the point across in an agonizing way—alternating the reading of Scriptures with crying and interpolating prayer with remonstrance. Dry up your tears. Do not exasperate your husband to the point where he makes horrible threats on other members of the family. Do not indulge in illusions about your husband's intentions, nor suppose that his temper tantrums are more than his attempt to secure co-operation from you. Show that you love your husband by being a wife to him.

ing to other people of which you have personal knowledge. Such words as "Pentagon totalitarianism," "free enterprise," "creeping socialism," "dynamic conservatism," "reactionary," "moss-back" or "selfish interest" may get something off the writer's chest, but these words are no substitute for intelligent argument and thought.

Write plainly and briefly. Nothing discourages a congressman more than a long, involved letter written in illegible handwriting. A short, typewritten note which makes a point without beating around the bush is the most effective kind of letter.

Give your honest opinions. Remember the congressman is far from home. When important national or international developments take place, all that he knows of the thinking at home is what he reads in the papers. He would prefer to talk to people at home, and your letters about Russian farmers, polio vaccine, national defense budgets, exchange of atomic information, economic aid for underdeveloped areas of the world and national farm policy are the best way a congressman has of finding out grass-roots thinking on these questions.

Study up on a problem and write frequently (but concisely) if you have strong convictions. Most congressmen welcome letters which show an intelligent understanding of a problem. A congressman who takes his mail to heart is, therefore, eager to have people keep writing him when the letter writer is expertly acquainted with such complicated problems as farm parity, highway costs, the impact of foreign aid programs and the handling of juvenile delinquency.

There are many citizens who have personal knowledge about the many problems which confront congressmen. It is their duty to share this knowledge with the men in the halls of Congress who must vote on these knotty questions.

Bill Smith

Only a few of a congressman's constituency can talk to him personally, but all can write him letters giving their views on congressional bills

Certainly the many young people who have participated in foreign aid programs are intimately equipped to offer advice to congressmen who must vote on this annual appropriation.

Write to your congressman as you would write a friend whom you wanted to convert to your point of view. A congressman is a human being. It is not uncommon for him to bolt party lines where he has strong personal convictions about an issue or where local sentiment is contrary to his party's policy. Pressure groups do not have the last word. It is the conscientious citizen who really counts the most with the bulk of America's congressmen. And unless the citizen is heard from, the pressure groups crowd out the citizens in getting to the ears of Congress.

The congressman who is given friendly advice in a letter, is a congressman who will put the national interest above party interest.

There are many roads that lead to Christ. The Christian is not one who has gone all the way with Christ. None of us has. The Christian is one who has found the right road. Though you may not be at the end of your journey, if you are on the right road, at least your wandering has ceased. Even though you may not be home, if you know the way you are not lost. As I see it, a Christian is one who has become a friend of Christ and is ever seeking to cultivate that friendship.

From When the Heart Is Hungry by Charles L. Allen (Fleming H. Revell Company)

The Christian and Communism

Leland Wilson

Chairman, Board of Administration, Northeastern Kansas

ABOUT two years ago J. B. Matthews, then director of investigations for the Senate Investigating Subcommittee, gained brief notoriety by charging in the American Mercury that the largest single group supporting communism in the United States was composed of Protestant clergymen. Other accusations followed. With this and the appearance of Bishop Oxnam and other ministers before an investigating committee, the press found delightful prey. Churchmen, somewhat dazed, wondered at the loyalty of the leadership of the church.

An investigation of the facts seemed to indicate that these men were not Communist "espionage agents" but were guilty of laxity in the use of their names and of joining with so-called "peace" movements.

The smoke from the battle which developed over this episode has nearly cleared. In fact, the hysteria once prevalent over this foreign ideology seems to have given way to a more rational approach to the problem. We speak of "peaceful co-existence" rather than "liberation." Russia, the test tube of Marxian philosophy, and our country exchange official visiting delegations, join in "summit" conferences, disarmament talks, and seem to be sincerely seeking a means to avoid co-extinction. Comes now also reports that churches in Russia, particularly those with Baptist affiliation, are quite active and relatively unhampered by government interference.

To be sure, the trends which present themselves are desirable and are to be extended if at all possible. But it should not be forgotten that the relaxed atmosphere which now exists between our own nation and that of the Soviet Union is not unlike that of former years when many peace promoters eagerly joined "peace" organizations which were actually fronts for a program not as ideally dedicated. Those who actively support international co-operation and peace are not often guilty of scapegoating and name-calling, but all too frequently they lean in the direction of making the black to look white and of grasping any straw that may appear to suggest peace. Christians ought to join an organization or contribute only after thoroughly investigating the organization which presents itself.

Nor can we suppose with the Dean of Canterbury that Christianity and communism as found in Russia are compatible and that time will bring a synthesis. Part of our dilemma lies in adequately distinguishing the ideology untenable to the Christian. Did not Luke describe the early Christians as holding their property in common? And the founding Brethren acted similarly in trying to recapture the vitality of the early church. If communism means that ownership is vested in the community or held in common, certainly the term may be applied in these cases. As in much of life, we find ourselves in semantic "hot water" for communism as exemplified in these two cases is quite different from that advocated by Marx.

Within the doctrine of Marx, there are certain principles which shall always remain alien to Christian philosophy. Let us briefly examine three of the most important. Supremacy of the state: As Christians, we believe not in the supremacy of the state but in the supreme being of God. Our first allegiance is not to the state but to him. We are patriots, but in a greater sense, we are super-patriots. For the most part, there may be no conflict between the two, but when to the individual conscience there does exist divergent demands, the call to serve God must receive priority. We are fortunate that we live in a country that recognizes this right. First of all, then, a Christian must reject Marxian communism because he believes in the supremacy of God over that of the state.

Nobility of the proletariat: We believe that God was the creator of all mankind and that they were created equal in the eyes of God, not on a superior-inferior basis. The kingdom which Jesus came to establish and which we are now called to join together in building does not recognize the barriers of class, caste, race, nationality, etc. As he spread his gospel, he challenged the poor and the rich, the propertyless and the propertied. Never does he suggest that one is to be regarded more highly than the other. Rather, his teaching seems to be in accord with that of Paul who wrote, "There shall be neither bond nor freeman. . ."

Materialistic philosophy: We cannot accept the economic motive as the most important in life. Believing that Jesus Christ correctly revealed the nature of God, we must take a spiritual view of life—not a materialistic one. The Marxian would hold to that of the material culture which is temporal—as Christians we firmly believe in those values which are eternal: love, charity and faith.

While we are not to acquiese in beliefs at variance with Christianity, we need to remind ourselves that the weapons of the Christian are those of the spirit of love. It calls not for resistance but an overcoming with our own good. Free association with others of different political and spiritual mind and an active demonstration of the power of Christianity will be far more potent than the most mighty of armies. As Kermit Eby has suggested, association with such does not imply that one has thereby become tainted, for our faith ought to be such that we may convert to those supreme and eternal values, rather than to be the converted.

belief in nothing but what you can lay your hands on—people went after him lock, stock and barrel. They had long since abandoned a faith in other worldiness and now they had a faith only in this worldliness. The war smashed that in with tumbling bombs. The people had neither stretch of soul for faith nor had they anything in their hands. With neither faith in materialism nor in spiritual values a vacuum was at the heart of life.

Into that vacuum—empty with desperation and surrounded by the hard realities of war—came the refugees streaming across the borders. They brought with them the inevitable cross-fertilization that comes with those who are uprooted from their homes. Ideas whose time had come and vital personalities who had a Christian message to share came to the fore.—Hope began to be revived that the church could mean something in the life of the people. Of this revival I wish to speak in a later article.

Only One Mission

Leland A. Nelson

OFTEN we defeat our own purposes by unwittingly using a procedure to accomplish our goal which is inconsistent and incompatible with the goal itself. What we mean to be a steppingstone may often become a stumbling block.

This we have done in the church as we have sought to achieve the Christian goals of brotherhood and peace. While we desire to unify the world and make the world one, we have often been guilty of creating imaginary barriers in the minds of people that unnecessarily divide and separate them.

On the one hand we say that all men are brothers—that there is only one family to which all belong (that it is God's family) and only one race (the human race). On the other hand we speak of most of our world neighbors and the members of this world family as aliens and foreigners. We talk of foreign countries or foreign missions. These terms tend to divide and separate. They emphasize our differences rather than our likenesses.

We know that there is only one world and that within our lifetime it has been reduced to a world neighborhood. Our biggest responsibility at the present hour is to remove all of the barriers—imaginary and real—that have separated us and to learn to live together as neighbors.

We will achieve our goal more quickly if we get in the habit of thinking of ourselves as neighbors and friends. We could eliminate one of these barriers in our thinking and practice rather quickly and easily if we would omit or erase the words foreign and foreigner from our vocabulary. Instead of talking about the foreign mission program of the church we need to realize that there is only one mission of the church and that is the world mission — "Go therefore and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, teaching them to observe all that I have commanded you; and lo, I am with you always, to the close of the age." This is the church's commission and includes all of the areas of Brethren service, evangelism and Christian education.

We shall see before long other churches taking such steps. This writer would hope that the Church of the Brethren might be first to take such a step in the family of churches. The General Brotherhood Board could bring a recommendation to Conference that we combine our Foreign Mission and Home Missions under one head — The World Mission Commission. Certainly we would need the same amount of leadership and supervision as at present, but we would eliminate the unfortunate term foreign which creates the barriers we are seeking by our mission program to break down. We might well consider calling our missionaries "good neighbors" or fraternal workers."

When "Suffer" Means "Let"

Luther A. Weigle

THE word suffer is used by the King James Version of the Bible in two quite distinct senses. It is used, of course, to translate the Hebrew and Greek verbs which mean to endure hardship, pain, affliction, insult, penalty and the like—there are sixty-nine cases of its use in this primary sense of the word. But it is also used sixty times to translate Hebrew and Greek verbs which mean to let, allow or permit.

The Revised Standard Version eliminates the use of the word suffer in the sense of let or permit and retains it only when it is used in the sense of undergo or endure. It thus removes an ambiguity for which there is no warrant in the original languages.

A little girl asked her mother, "Why does Jesus want little children to suffer?" The mother replied, "He doesn't. What makes you think so?" The child said, "That is what they taught us in Sunday school today."

In the year 1952 two magazines of wide circulation carried poignant accounts of the sufferings of children in Korea, with the headline, "Suffer, Little Children."

In the order for the baptism of infants contained in the manual published in 1936 by one of our Protestant denominations the text of Matt. 19:14 is printed as follows:

And Jesus said, Suffer little children, and forbid them not to come unto me;
For of such is the kingdom of heaven.

By printing this verse in three lines as though it were poetry, and by omitting the comma which the King James Version has after "forbid them not," the expression Suffer little children is made to stand by itself as though it were an injunction to endure or tolerate little children. But the meaning in the Greek is unmistakably, "Let the children come to me, and do not hinder them." It is to the credit of the Book of Worship for the use of the Methodist Church that it adopted an unambiguous rendering of this verse even before the publication of the Revised Standard Version of the New Testament. The word suffer is rejected by all modern translations of this verse which I have consulted—Twentieth Century, Weymouth, Moffatt, Ballantine, Goodspeed, Williams, Verkuyl, Confraternity, Torrey, Phillips, Rieu.

Protestant Youth Representatives Denounce UMT

Representatives of the nation's ten million Protestant young people recently denounced universal military training in all of its forms and criticized Congress for "enacting a piece-meal program which the American people have traditionally refused to accept." The General Council of the United Christian Youth Movement also took action on a wide range of social and political issues. The 165 delegates from 14 denominations and 36 state youth councils commended the Eisenhower government for its efforts to achieve a world program of reduction and control of armaments.

Present at this UCYM council meeting as representative of Brethren youth were Ivan Patterson of New Lebanon, Ohio; John Picking of Marion, Pa.; Joanne Lett of Broadbent, Oregon; David Rittenhouse of Queen Anne, Md.; Janet Hilleary of Elida, Ohio.

Episcopal Deputies Reject Proposal to Drop "Protestant"

A proposal to drop the word Protestant from the name of the Protestant Episcopal church in the U.S.A. was defeated by the House of Deputies of the church's 58th General Convention held in Honolulu. Clerical members were about divided in their opinion. Laymen were five to two against dropping the word Protestant.

In an address opening the convention, Bishop Henry Knox Sherrill, presiding bishop, said, "Are we to leave the moral issues of nuclear warfare to groups of scientists? Or the spiritual implications of the race problem to the courts? . . . No, the church with a humble realization of the complexity of modern problems nevertheless has a responsibility to state great ethical and spiritual principles. At her best in every age the church has fulfilled a prophetic role."

Sees U.S. Moving Toward Egalitarian Society

Speaking at a Labor Sunday Rally, sponsored by the Council of Churches of Greater Kansas City, Kermit Eby said that he believed the United States is "moving toward the egalitarian society which reformers have long anticipated." He pointed out that the greater percentage of our spendable income is in the middle brackets and that "today it isn't the idle rich who are copied but, instead, the ingenious workers." He said, "Only peace and the conditions which make peace preferable can keep us continually striving toward the goal envisioned by the prophets who foretold a world of 'swords, beaten into ploughshares' and men safe 'under their own vines and figtrees.'"

Assemblies of God Report Membership Increase

Membership in the Assemblies of God, a Pentecostal body, has increased sixty-five per cent in the past ten years. The church now has a membership of 400,047. The number of ordained ministers has grown at an even greater ratio than church membership during the decade—from 5,061 to 8,650. The Assemblies of God now have 7,320 churches throughout the United States and about 5,000 elsewhere.

Indian Yearbook Gives New Regulations on Missionaries

India's new policy restricting foreign missionaries is set forth in the latest issue of the government yearbook. It states that the issuance of visas to foreign missionaries will be governed by two considerations: (1) No new missionaries will be permitted to enter India, either as replacements or additional members of missions, unless Indian missionaries are not available to fill the positions. (2) While foreign missionaries already in India will be allowed to carry on their present activity, new missionaries will not be welcome if they plan to devote themselves entirely to the propagation of the gospel. They should, in addition, have suitable qualifications as educators or social workers.

Religious Educators Push Idea of Team Teachers

The latest idea in Sunday-school practice is to sign up man and woman "team teachers." Christian education specialists are advocating the idea of two teachers to represent the "family situation" in children's religious training, according to Mrs. Alice Goddard, director of children's work for the National Council of Churches.

She noted that Sunday-school teachers have long been predominantly women. She said churches are becoming more concerned as the number of women teachers increases in the public school system. Many churches fear that a boy seldom sees any man but his father, and not much of him. Mrs. Goddard said, "Children need an adult image of both a man and woman who are fine and good. That's why we think the Sunday school should have both."

Religious Services Provided in Prison Code of UN Congress

A requirement that spiritual counseling and religious services be provided to inmates of penal institutions is included in a prisoners' charter adopted unanimously by the first United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and Treatment of Offenders. One of the rules suggested provides that every prisoner should be allowed to satisfy the needs of his religious life by attending services provided in the institution and having in his possession the books of religious observance and instruction of his religious denomination.

Kansas City Church Council Plans for Unchurched Children

The Council of Churches of Greater Kansas City, Mo., has sent the ministers of its member churches a fifteen-page mimeographed report with the names and addresses of close to 550 children in the area who have no church affiliation. The names of the youngsters were secured from the rolls of weekday church school classes conducted by the council during the past academic year. Ministers are dividing up the names on the lists and each will make a personal call upon the children and their families living in his area.

Life to Publish Special Issue on Christian Religion

Life Magazine will publish a special 120-page issue on Dec. 21 devoted entirely to the Christian religion. It will be bound in a heavy-stock semi-permanent cover to facilitate its library use as a reference source. Included in the issue will be eighteen color pages on the life of Christ as interpreted by the world's greatest artists, an article tracing Christianity from the ascension to the present, the story of the Bible in America, a color portfolio in modern church architecture in the U.S., an examination of the problems facing American Christianity, a report on Christianity in Europe, the story of famous hymns and choirs, and a photographic essay on Christmas and Easter in the Holy Land.

High Mixed Marriage Rate in Iowa

More than a third of all marriages involving Roman Catholics in Iowa during 1953 were mixed marriages, according to a report read at the annual meeting of the American Sociological Society. The Iowa law provides the first occasion in the United States that a state vital statistics office has included a query on religious denominations in its registration forms for marriage and divorce.

Protestant Churches Launch Two Television Programs

Protestant churches are launching two new series of television programs this fall and winter and are developing a master plan for an elaborate Christian education series for children to begin in 1957. The two new series are Man to Man, produced by the National Council and The Way, produced by the Methodist Church for release through the National Council.

Man to Man, a fifteen-minute series to be launched Oct. 1, features four Protestant leaders, Dr. Ralph W. Sockman, Dr. Donald Barnhouse, Dr. Louis Evans and Dr. John A. Redhead. They will be started in different sections of the country and will rotate every thirteen weeks. The Way, a half-hour dramatic series on the Christian gospel of love, with a different cast each week, is scheduled to begin Jan. 1.

HAS the "spirit of Schwarzenau" any answers to our turbulent world of today, with its tension and misunderstandings? Can the spirit which in 1708 led eight refugees to band together in an attempt to live the Christian way in everyday life now lead a troubled world in the direction of peace?

A partial answer to these questions is suggested by the two girls pictured standing together above Alexander Mack's mill; they are dedicated to building a bridge between nations and peoples. Shirley Ulrich has spent the last two years studying in her church college, La

Verne. This past spring she came to Germnay to participate in an international work camp. Young people from ten nations came together for five weeks to build a home for youth leadership training and to build international friendship and goodwill. Now Shirley is participating in the activities of the Goettingen Paedagogische Hochschule, where she will study this winter. In September and October she will live with Gerda Hitzeman's family in their parsonage in Berlin. Gerda is a refugee from East Germany, where she was expelled from the university she was attending because she participated in the Christian youth organization. She has studied the past year in the Goettingen Paedagogische Hochschule and will study this coming year in La Verne College. She has been spending the time prior to the opening of college with Shirley's parents in Wenatchee, Wash.

These two girls are only a sample of the student exchange program. Since its beginning in 1949, approximately 668 German and Austrian teenagers and three Latin American teenagers have been brought to the United States by the State Department to live in Christian families for a year and attend high school. In addition students from Germany, Austria, Japan, Samoa, India, Puerto Rico, Iran, Africa, Indonesia, Malaya, Italy, Korea, Jordan, China and other countries have attended Brethren colleges. One Brethren boy has spent a year as an exchangee in India. Eleven American Brethren youth have spent an exchange year in Germany under the sponsorship of the Brethren Service Commission. Three more are there this year.

To see the scope of the exchange idea in the Church of the Brethren, one should also consider the approximately 100 Brethren Volunteer Service workers who have served in foreign lands such as Germany, Puerto Rico, Austria, England, Italy, Turkey, Egypt, Jordan, Nigeria and Greece. In addition, young people from Germany, France, Denmark and Holland have been a part of the B.V.S. program in Europe and the United States.

Does this international exchange program offer hope for world peace? I believe it does. Here are four illustrations:

Klaus, a German teenager whose father had been killed by the Russians during the war, vowed to his mother that he would avenge the death of his father. After living for a year in America with a Brethren family, he reported to the district conference that he must now break his promise to his mother; he could no longer carry out vengeance.

Volkhard wrote to John Eberly, "When I was in the hospital after my accident I had a hard time to understand why you, the Department of State and my American family went to so much trouble just because of me! I understand it now, and I am thankful for everything you did. My parents appreciated it very much. Daddy and mother made me feel as if I was their oldest son. I have often a hard time to believe that this is the nation which is or was the conqueror in 1945. It gets harder to believe every day I live with this family."

A German teenager said to an American friend as they were finishing the building of a church, "We can't bomb this building, can we? We've worked too hard to build it."

An American and a German foster brother said to each other upon parting "We can't ever kill each other, can we?"

A change in the direction of world brotherhood takes place in the heart of almost every exchangee, and no one can measure the amount of goodwill and understanding which is developed by each exchangee in his new land and in his own land upon his return.

Does the "spirit of Schwarzenau" live on? Yes! The spirit of following Christ's way of love and reconciliation, no matter what the cost, which has given our church one of its chief reasons for existence since its beginnings in Schwarzenau, is exactly the tonic needed today to bring a world full of distrust and fear to a spirit of brotherhood and peace. This spirit is now working in many ways in Western Germany and various parts of the Western world. Are we ready to extend its influence to Eastern Germany and other countries now behind the Iron Curtain as it becomes possible? Are we ready to have 1,000 local churches sponsor one person from another country in their community each year? Are we ready to have each local church have a representative in a foreign land each year? Are we ready for the "spirit of Schwarzenau" to grow?

Hastings State Hospital

Joe Noffsinger

WHEN I began working in a mental hospital a whole new field was opened to me. I had heard many things about insane people through jokes and rumors; this was an opportunity to find out first hand about them.

A volunteer prepares food for patients who are eating a special diet for research purposes

However, my position here was not that of a psychologist or a recreation leader or an aide. I came as a cook (though my knowledge of cooking was nil). I was not to be an ordinary cook, mind you, but one of three B.V.S.'ers who cook a special diet for research purposes for twenty-eight patients who are the experimental subjects.

Albeit mental patients are involved, the research we help to conduct has nothing to do with mental disease. Rather, it is at this time a comparison of butter with other oils and margarines. It is an effort to determine which of these contain the highest percentage of cholesterol, which is one of the known causes of arteriosclerosis and other heart diseases.

The practical aspect of this research is to inform the public as to which of these would be best to use in relation to cholesterol. This data is soon to be released.

We have become well acquainted with some of our patients since we eat, sleep and work on the hospital grounds. We must know our diet patients well enough to rate them psychobiologically every week; we learn to know others as they aid us in the kitchen work.

From observing and studying I have drawn a few conclusions of my own. Popular propaganda emphasizes so much the oddities of "nuts" that it fails to represent them as human beings. Of course, there are many who are too ill to take any responsibility, but others are well enough to work in the kitchen or cafeteria, on the 1,200-acre farm, in the laundry or at the numerous little tasks on the hospital grounds. Some really work hard which is amazing, considering the lack of motivation—they are in an institution and they are not paid.

Recently one of the patients on "our cottage" died. He was a good worker and was always friendly; we will miss him.

Be not deceived, most go to church and are as religious in everyday life as the "normal" Christian.

This project is not unlike others in that there is frustration. The major factor in my case is the knowledge that many of the patients with whom I work are not expected to improve. Still, I have enjoyed my privilege of working here and hope others have and will share the happiness I have found.

Tape Recorders Go to and From Church

Elbert Reish
Elgin, Illinois

THE projector, either movie or slide and filmstrip, is usually considered the last word in the field of audio-visuals, but a relatively new and rapidly developing medium is the tape recorder. Today it is available to, and within the means of, most churches.

If you have a tape recorder in your church, are you using it to the fullest advantage? Some of the following suggestions might be helpful. If your church does not have a recorder or one available, a little consideration of these ideas will indicate how useful it might be and you will wonder how you are managing without one.

To get satisfactory results in average work, you need not purchase an expensive machine. You will find that the frequency response of many of the low-priced models approaches that of the higher priced ones and will serve admirably unless you have some "hi-fi" fans who wish to pay the difference. Look especially for ease of operation and simple, strong construction.

Ministry to Shut-Ins

Now that you have a recorder, the problem is how to make the best use of it. Perhaps one of the most appreciated functions of the tape recorder is the ministry to shut-ins and those who for one reason or another must be absent from certain meetings and worship services. An ordinary worship service will go on one track of a seven-inch reel at three and three-quarter inches per second. For this purpose, the slower speed is quite satisfactory. Place the microphone in a balcony or central location. If your church is using a public address system, tap into it with a patch cord and you can get the complete program with little attention to the recorder and with a minimum of distractive noises.

Such a recorded service will be a welcome visitor to those confined to their homes or in the hospital.

As Teacher to Musicians

Are there one or two members in your choir whose voices inadvertently "stick out like a sore thumb"? They would be good soloists except that they lack the necessary equipment and training. Try some candid recording and if need be, some casual remarks as the recording is "played back." Most people do not recognize their own voices when they first hear them. This revelation often leads to improvement. Choirs hearing themselves will learn to improve their enunciation and timbre. The recording speaks more clearly to choir members than do the words of the director as he tries to instruct them for better performance.

Not only is the recorder useful in choir practice sessions, but many choir members and friends will want copies of special numbers and concerts. For this type of work, you may want to use a dynamic microphone for higher fidelity. It will be better to record the music at seven and one-half inches per second or "fast" speed. Use two microphones and a mixer for better balance, if they are available.

Drama is important in the church and here again the recorder will be of great value in preparing skits as well as in play practice itself. Often, when time does not permit or when proper facilities are not available, it is not desirable to put on a "live" act. The tape recorder is just the thing for producing a dramatic skit for class entertainment or enlightment. Situation dramas, so often used to start discussions, may well be prepared and produced by this method.

In this area, some idea of what we call microphone technique is helpful. As a rule, a voice will have different characteristics at different angles and distances from the microphone. If too close, the tones may sound muffled and the syllables may

Confined members appreciate the blessing of having the opportunity of sharing in their own church services by means of recordings

Some pastors and delegates use tape recorders to capture the high moments of inspiration and worship at Annual Conference to share with members and friends back home make a harsh popping sound. A person with higher pitched voice can usually work closer to the microphone without this "overloading" occurring. If too far away, the voice may seem to come from another room. These characteristics may be used to advantage, but should be taken into consideration. Also, each microphone has a working angle or direction in which it is sensitive to sound. The common crystal mike which comes with most recorders, if in a horizontal position, will pick up sound from all directions. The dynamic which is quite popular has a narrower angle, usually about 100 degrees. If either of these is the cardioid type, it will have a still wider angle, about 180 degrees in the shape of a heart. A ribbon microphone, if you should chance to use one, is sensitive in two opposite directions with a narrower angle of about 45 degrees in each direction. An understanding of these angles and the consequent possibility of working "on mike" or "off mike" is a great help in producing fade in and fade out or the illusion of motion or distance. Remember that creating an illusion without the use of visual effects is a challenge.

Self Criticism for Speakers

Does your minister have the opportunity occasionally to hear himself as others hear him? He will appreciate the chance. Perhaps there are some potential ministers who like to practice on speeches.

Tape recording at Annual Conference is becoming increasingly popular, and rightly so, for this offers a fine opportunity to capture outstanding talks, music and other inspirational material. Some of these recordings add a great deal of interest to delegates' reports. There is no reason why this plan cannot be extended to include district and other significant meetings.

Expansion of Radio Service

Your local radio station would undoubtedly be glad to give your church or council of churches regular time on the radio. The chances are, the program would need to be tape recorded at the proper speed and of the proper length of time and delivered to the station. Such a program might take any number of forms from spot announcements to elaborate plays, depending upon your capabilities and the needs of your community.

Some such very successful programs within my experience consist of the following: Religion in the News, a discussion of news items of religious origin; Daily Devotions, a short period of poetry, comments and prayer for the day; Hymn of the Week, a time each week devoted to solo or choir music with accompanying interpretation or worship service; Meet the Churches, a discussion program pertaining to anything of interest that is happening in the churches of the community, such as interviews with outstanding visitors, visits to vacation church schools for discussion with the children and their leaders, stories from visitors to mission lands and other interesting places. The tape recorder opens the door to the field of radio which presents a varied and interesting opportunity for witnessing.

Entertainment

An up-and-coming church school class will want to have a tape recorder available. A recorder lends itself readily as a source of entertainment. A good tape recording makes excellent background music for socials, etc. Music, bits of conversation or other incidents are interesting when played back later in the program. As mentioned before, a recorded skit might make a good discussion starter. Even the closing worship or devotional service might be enriched by use of the tape recorder. It helps to produce a smooth running, effective service.

Help your church to widen its outreach by utilizing a tape recorder as suggested and in other ways.

CHRIST, THE HOPE OF OUR NEW HOME

Nvwa Balami
Nigeria, West Africa

I WAS born into the home of parents who did not know the God of Christ our Savior. My mother died when I was only a year old and my father died when I was four or five years old. I was taken to the mission nursery at Garkida. There I was brought up to the age when I could eat food by myself. Then I went to live with my Aunt Makida, who knew the Lord and was baptized. When I was old enough, I went to the mission school. After finishing there, the Lord really blessed me and I was able to attend the mission's teacher training center. After two years there I began my teaching.

Now it was time for me to think about a wife. These are the questions I raised: "Whom am I going to marry? Who will be my partner or helper?" My prayer was "Thy will be done." The first attempt I made was to engage a girl who was born into a Christian family and who herself was a Christian. She had the same standard of education, too. However, I soon found that our plans were dying out and both of us felt that it would be better not to arrange for the marriage.

The second attempt was also a Christian girl. Our plans worked well in the beginning, I was sure now that I should get a wife. Soon afterwards trouble arose. This trouble led to the cancelling of our marriage plans. When I failed the second time, some of my friends, both African and American, thought that I would feel more sad than I did. Later when I was talking with one missionary lady, she said, "We thought you would be very unhappy but we still see you going about singing. What made you feel that way?" My answer to her was, "I believe it is not God's plan for us to be husband and wife." She looked at me amazed and said, "May the Lord direct you in choosing another girl for a wife." I feel that I was really blessed by her last sentence because God really directed in selecting the third time.

At first when I began thinking about this girl, it seemed impossible and doubtful that I would marry her. She came from a family of non-Christians. Things had to be explained very carefully to her people since they were not acquainted with our church services and activities. Sometimes the girl's parents talked as if they did not want me to marry their daughter. (In our custom sometimes the girl's parents act like this even though they want the man to marry their daughter. They do not want to agree quickly after the first few meetings.)

After much careful talking and planning, things went on well to prepare for our marriage. We chose Jan. 30 for our wedding day. Sometimes I doubted but I know God had his hand in our plans. The day grew nearer and nearer. Finally the day came. There was much excitement. We gathered flowers to put in the church. Soon we saw guests arriving from Garkida, Shaffa, Waka and Wandali. In the worship service Mr. Minso preached about the home. Immediately after the service our missionary minister, Monroe Good, performed the wedding ceremony.

My wife, Sansi, has been taking a keen interest in the church services. Last year she took the covenant which symbolizes her promise to God to follow and serve him. We wish our home to be a light to the people around us and to those we meet every day. We hope to be able to be an example of a real Christian home in our community. Both of us think and believe that if we seek the will of God, he will be with us even unto the end of the world. Things are still quite new to Sansi, but she seems to be interested in learning new things. A wife and husband eating together is not a customary thing in our culture, but we have chosen to eat together in order to show our people how it can be done in the Christian way.

We ask your prayers on us so that we can put Christ first in all that we do to witness his name and teachings to others.

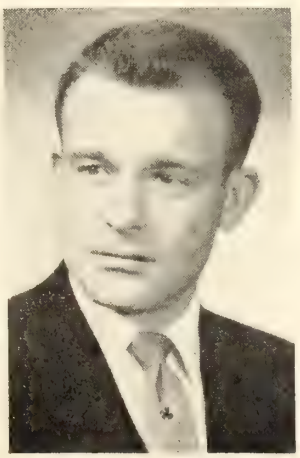
Robert Ray Swank



Dale Zimmerman

ROBERT RAY SWANK was born May 11, 1926. He is one of seven children born to Ray and Gladys Swank, both of whom reside in Bremen, Ind., the birthplace of Robert.

Bob grew up on the farm and attended the Bremen Church of the Brethren. At the age of twelve he was taken into the church through baptism. However, the enticements of the world were stronger than those of the church and Robert drifted away from the vows he had made at baptism.

Following his graduation from the Bremen high school, Robert enlisted in the United States Navy and served as a tail gunner on a navy patrol bomber from 1944-46. While in the service he met and became an intimate friend of a Christian young man who, says Robert, "helped win me to a true conversion experience." It was in the military service that his real spiritual growth began.

Closely associated with this spiritual awakening was the development of the peace position so characteristic of the Church of the Brethren. Today Bob proudly speaks of his pacifist views. His interest in peace and brotherhood is probably best displayed in his desire to serve his fellow men in another part of the world.

Robert Ray Swank

It was not until he was discharged from the navy that Robert felt called to go into full-time Christian service. A week at Camp Mack in Indiana and the fellowship of other Christian young people induced him to enter Manchester College, where he began preparing himself for service on the mission field. At Manchester Robert met and married Mary Louise Gorden of La Porte, Ind. Concerning his marriage he says, "I have felt God's guidance in the choice of a mate who would be a help and an inspiration in the work."

After graduating from Manchester in 1950, Robert studied for one year at Bethany Biblical Seminary. The next two years found the Swanks engaged in full-time pastoral work at the Blissville Church of the Brethren in Indiana. In addition to his work at Blissville, he also taught school for one year. In the fall of 1953 he again enrolled at Bethany, but continued his pastoral duties on the week ends. Having resigned from his charge at Blissville in the fall of 1954, Robert was relieved of the strenuous parish obligations during his senior year at Bethany.

Since his call to full-time Christian service, it has always been his desire to be a missionary to Africa. When asked why, Bob replied, "I have always been interested in Africa, and so my thoughts naturally turned toward mission work in that country. For nine years I have felt that God has been guiding me to this field of service." Thus, when Robert and Mary Louise set sail for Africa on the 18th of August, a nine-year dream had come true.

Youth work in the Northern District of Indiana, three years of parish experience, intense study at Bethany and love for his fellow men have prepared Robert for this high call of God.

NOW IS THE TIME . . . .

To plan a School of Missions

A large percentage of our churches have found the school of missions to be a valuable part of the church's program. January is the month when these schools are often held—but any other month can serve just as well.

The suggested study themes for this year are

Home Theme: Indian Americans

Foreign Theme: The Christian Mission in a Revolutionary World

Good materials for both these themes are already available. Write to the General Brotherhood Board today for your free copy of

N. Illinois and Wisconsin Goes Forward

We Would Be Building

BETWEEN now and this time tomorrow, two hundred thousand babies will be born. Suppose you were to be one of them. Here would be your chances.

"Your chance of being born in the United States would be one in twenty, of being born in Russia, about the same. Your chance of being born white would be only one in three. Your chance of being born in India would be one in nine, in China one in four, and if you were born in either one of these places your chance of reaching maturity, one in two.

"You are very likely to be born a Confucian, a Buddhist or a Mohammedan. Your chance of being born Christian is one in four."

No one can do much to change the odds of your being born in the United States or Russia, white or colored, but we are able to help the chances of the two hundred thousand babies being born daily to become Christian.

Are you willing?

Do you believe there is anything in life more important than becoming a Christian? Will you, a Christian, pay the price to help win men to Christ?

The church is the best means of doing this. In order to keep up with the increase in population we need to build a new church every seven minutes.

Will you help?

The Church of the Brethren can make a real contribution to peace, to feeding the hungry, to clothing the poor and to the kingdom of God. The need of mankind for these things is ever increasing. We must increase our facilities for doing the job.

We need to build new churches. We need Christians to bend their knees in prayer, sweat their brows in work and shrink their bank accounts, not until it hurts, for some of us hurt too easily, but until it feels good with God.

The church must grow or die, and it would be a tragic death. A man once went to raise funds for a new church. One person refused to give because he said the church cost too much. The brother asking for the contribution said, "Twenty-five years ago a son was born to me. From the beginning he cost money. First, there were doctors and the hospital. There were food, clothing and toys, then music lessons, books and an allowance. Then he went to college and that cost more money. Sometimes I thought the boy was costing too much. Then he got sick and died. We buried him about a year ago. He has not cost me anything since."

Are you willing to help pay the cost of letting our church grow while there is yet time? Are you willing to help increase the chances of the multitudes to know Christ?

Are you ready to know the real thrill of building a new church for his kingdom?

If you are, you know what you must do to make you feel good with God. Will you do it?

From the brochure We Would be Building, Northern Illinois and Wisconsin District

Northern Illinois and Wisconsin Laymen Lead the Way

FOR the second consecutive year at the Northern Illinois and Wisconsin district meeting, laymen led out in an attempt to lift the sights of all present. In 1954, at the conference held at the Elgin church a dramatic presentation was given on Sunday evening in which the district was challenged to consider the need for church expansion. It was pointed out in dramatic fashion that for years we had been closing churches and that only one new church has been established in twenty-five years. It seemed as though this concern might escape without any positive action. Then in the midst of Monday's business session, laymen led out in a strong appeal to implement the concern. As a result, a goal of $20,000 was set for church extension. Ways of raising this item, not in the budget, were to be worked out.

During the year the district Board of Administration and others began to plan and to dream. A Fellowship of Church Builders was under way. Plans were formulated and presented to the district board for consideration. Posters and data were prepared for the 1955 district meeting. When we came to the meeting held at Lena, Ill., we were stimulated by some of these effective posters.

Things really began to happen, when the budget was presented in the business session. The district board came with a bold, new proposal. It had prepared a new budget which included not only the administrative items, totaling $13,355 but had also included three more. There were $3,500 for Camp Emmaus and $2,500 for Manchester College. Previously these had been extra-budgetary items. Then $20,000 was added for the Fellowship of Church Builders. Instead of a usual budget of $13,355 with $6,000 nonbudgetary for camp and college, we faced a $39,355 budget. It represented more than a 100% increase.

There was excellent discussion. But the significant thing was the way fine laymen, one by one, arose and pleaded for the proposal. They based their appeals upon the need of each Christian to give generously. They told of what had happened to them in this area of life. It made a profound impact on everyone. Along with a strong support for the new budget, the district also passed a resolution on stewardship. It was similar to the one passed by Annual Conference but went beyond that one in suggesting that each church should set a goal of giving two thirds of its budget to world outreach and one third to local church work.

It was after that that the most surprising and moving experience came. The district board had recommended no quotas for the local churches. They felt quotas tend to set a ceiling on giving. Instead, they had contacted all churches previously asking them to study the matter and suggest their goals. Only a few of the churches had been able to do this. However, six of the twenty-eight churches had done so. Their delegates arose and told of their experiences and gave the goals they had set. These six totaled $17,-300. The experience was so deeply moving that when the last delegate had reported and the total was given, the moderator called the conference to prayer and dedication.

One is made to think what could happen if all other churches and all other districts had such fine laymen pressing for the Brotherhood aim, that we "Seek First His Kingdom."

Instrument for Justice

ACCORDING to the prophet Isaiah, when God turned to the house of Israel and the men of Judah looking for justice, he found bloodshed instead. He looked "for righteousness, but behold, a cry!" Because men desire justice in place of bloodshed, they have established courts in their local communities and in the state and nation. They elect judges and choose juries to hear the cries of any who are injured or oppressed. They establish laws in the hope that their statutes will protect the innocent, condemn the guilty and provide a peaceful means of resolving conflicts.

Can the disputes between nations be settled in the same manner, by law and justice rather than by bloodshed? The International Court of Justice, shown here in session at The Hague in the Netherlands, is a hopeful attempt at an answer. It is open to all states willing to accept in advance its jurisdiction as binding. Christians, who respect the highest moral laws as binding upon all men, will pray for the enlightened and extended use of this instrument for establishing international law.

Enjoy the Church Paper

When we are completely away from our own church and our own people we really enjoy our church paper. Keep up the good work; it is very much worth your best efforts. It helps keep those of us who live so far from a Brethren church informed and up to date on what the churches are doing.—Elmer L. Huffman, Chautauqua, N. Y.

Help U. S. Get Out of Liquor Business

"Why do you spend money for that which is not bread and labor for that which does not satisfy?" (Isa. 55:2).

Why do people vote for candidates who obtain office through pretense of being dry, but never satisfy their supporters? The Democrats and Republicans advocate legalizing and commercializing liquor. Help get the U. S. of America out of the liquor business, which is more dangerous than the atomic bomb. When people are sober they can control the bomb, but they never can control the effects of liquor when it is commercialized.—A Reader.

If I Were a Pastor

I am not a pastor and I never will be, but as I look at it from a lay minister and elder's viewpoint, if I were a pastor I think I would want to do a few of these things:

1. I would survey all my membership and would try to use on all important committees and other places the best qualified workers first, those who have spent time and money in colleges and special training schools to prepare themselves for teaching.

2. As a courteous gesture when there were other ministers in the congregation on Sunday morning, I would invite them to participate in the morning worship.

3. If I had an active elder in my congregation I would use him as presiding elder if he would serve. I would also use him as adviser and assistant pastor in all my work.

4. If there were lay ministers in the congregation, I would use them in the work of the ministry, if they would serve and in no way isolate or ostracize them from the ministry.

5. If I had no lay ministers I would try to develop at least one and use him in the outreach of the congregation in visitation, anointings, prayer meetings, pulpit supply at mission points.

6. I would not accept a full pastorate with a membership so small that the full budget of the local church would work a hardship on its members, and close the door to the outreach of the church, such as district and Brotherhood funds.

7. I would insist that all my teachers and leaders take at least one session in district training schools and all officers of the church, especially pastoral board and cabinet members attend district meetings, spiritual life conferences, regional conferences and Annual Meeting when in our region.

8. I would encourage all young people and children to attend church camp instead of other competitive camps.

9. I would discourage the feeling that there are "too many" of any group in the church, such as teachers, deacons, ministers, etc. We cannot have "too many" workers in any group. When we discourage our leadership, we are discouraging many more of our membership than we sometimes realize.

10. I would refuse to be my own adviser, but would seek advice of local and district elders and leaders. —H. C. Spangler, Roanoke, Va.

Out of Place

I want to protest against having the column and writings or contributions under the caption of "The Family Counselor" continued. Many of us doubt, or many people at least, have read many of the problems of both young and old, of married and single folks. Some of these problems have shown plainly that back of it is the poisonous serpent that has entered into many once happy homes and happy hearts, and now has crept into the heart and committed its dastardly deed. Such articles may be accepted through some paper that comes to every home for information and guidance. But when it comes to finding place for such matter in our religious paper, I consider it out of place. It tends to do more harm than good. I do not think that it is helpful or educative or even morally healthful to any reader of the Gospel Messenger. The matter I have particular reference to is found in the Gospel Messenger of Sept. 10 on page 11. And this is not the first of the kind I have read of a similar nature in the Gospel Messenger.—John W. Root, Lafayette, Ind.

A PRAYER

For the United Nations and World Peace

ALMIGHTY AND EVER-LIVING GOD, our eternal Father, in whose will is our peace and strength: Teach thy warring children, we beseech thee, the way of understanding and peace.

Forgive us the national sin that so often besets us: the pride of wealth and power that leads us to take international action by ourselves alone, the selfishness that binds us to the needs of other people, the suspicion and fear of the stranger within and outside our gates. In thy deep mercy, eternal God, grant that our beloved country may join with other nations in acts of compassion for a suffering humanity, in working together to reconcile differences between peoples, in seeking to establish a foundation of trust on which to build a more peaceful world.

Bless the United Nations, we pray thee, and all those international servants who work through it to save this and succeeding generations from the scourge of war. Do thou cause its work to prosper in many lands and among many peoples, that all thy children may be helped to find a finer and more abundant way of life.

Lead the entire world, our Father, to have a new birth of freedom and justice, of mercy and truth—to the glory of thy holy name. Amen.

UNITED NATIONS DAY 1955

OCTOBER 24, is United Nations Day. Throughout the world, men of goodwill pause to honor the tenth anniversary of the coming into effect of the Charter of the United Nations.

In the United States. President Eisenhower issued a proclamation, recognizing the contribution of the UN "toward realizing the hopes of mankind for an ordered world based on the supremacy of reason and justice." He called on the citizens of this nation to demonstrate their faith in the UN by contributing to a better public understanding of the problems, aims and achievements of this international organization.

The special United Nations emblem symbolically displays the crossed branches of laurel, victory and peace, embracing the map of the world.

The drafting and ratification of the Charter of the United Nations ten years ago was an important milestone in the age-old struggle for an ordered world. Centuries of painful experience has taught us that a community finds peace only under law and order. Responsible citizens support and maintain the institutions of government in their local, state and national communities.

Thoughtful citizens are becoming increasingly aware that the physical and spiritual brotherhood of the world must be translated into the social, civic and political institutions that characterize civilization.

In the first short decade of operation of the United Nations, a great physical plant has been developed. The headquarters secretariat, conference, and General Assembly buildings have been completed and rise to mark the Manhattan skyline of New York City. The land on which they stand is now, by resolution of the legislature of the state of New York, exterritorial. Just as our District of Columbia is no longer part of Virginia and Maryland any more than it actually is part of Massachusetts,

UNations

Visitors to the United Nations headquarters in New York outnumber those to all other tourist attractions in the city. Most of the meetings are open and admission is free; headphones are available for the simultaneous translation system in five official languages

Illinois and Oregon, so the United Nations headquarters is territory of its sixty member nations.

Gradually, experimentally, the UN is assuming the shape of government. It is developing in response to the necessities of the world community in which we live.

The UN Postal Administration issues stamps that are recognized as valid postage in the ninety-three member countries of the Universal Postal Union.

Simultaneous translation has broken the language barrier and enables the exchange of ideas in the five official languages. Visitors to the UN sessions, which are free and usually open to the public, can tune in to the language of their choice. Visitors to the UN outnumber all those to other tourists' attractions in the great vacation city of New York.

An essential requirement for world order is the rule of law. There is a progressive realization of the need to develop and codify the international rules by which nations must share this one world.

The International Court of Justice is the principal judicial organ of the UN. It is open to nations willing to accept its jurisdiction, and renders advisory opinions on request of other UN organs or specialized agencies.

This court is a far step forward from the raw anarchy of jungle law where dog eats dog. It is a far step from the concept of justice based on "consent of the governed" because, so far, it has been granted no direct jurisdiction over the individual, a basic concept of justice. In the process of finding nations innocent or guilty, the people suffer, innocent and guilty alike.

Only when people as citizens can elect representatives to a parliamentary body with actual legislative powers can a world court have real laws to interpret and justice be done.

It is in the interpretation of laws, in finding an individual innocent or guilty of their infraction, that legal order is accomplished. When at last this concept is applied to world affairs, the crushing burden of armaments can be reduced and the establishment of real peace and security will be achieved.

The Charter of the UN provides that the subject of revision or review shall be placed on the agenda of the tenth General Assembly.

This means that right now, the delegates must consider—without veto—whether a review conference shall be held to re-evaluate and possibly ammend the Charter after this first ten years.

The draftsmen of the Charter recognize that it was not a static document, impossible in a static world. Our own Secretary of State announced that it was obsolete before it was signed and sealed, by virtue of the dawning of the atomic age.

Throughout 1954 and 1955 the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations held hearings across the country to obtain the views of the citizens of the United States on the all-important question: Should the Charter be revised and, if so, how? A review of these hearings, more than two thousand pages of testimony,* runs from the rabid "throw the bounders out!" extreme to detailed blueprints for a world state.

But the hearings themselves

Careful in Our Stewardship

CAN we be too broad-minded in our giving? A Congregational minister thinks so. Dr. Henry Smith Leiper says, "Some good causes appeal to all citizens, but we alone support our own Christian mission projects." He notes that some Christians are willing to help almost every good cause but their own churches.

Sometimes we respond to appeals simply because we are on a mailing list. We seldom take the time to evaluate carefuly the appeals that come to us. We may be the victim of some charity rackets. More likely we get in the habit of supporting causes that are worthy, though hardly as worthwhile as the local church needs we overlook.

For example, many of our people contribute to a certain Roman Catholic institution simply because it is so well publicized and because letters come to our doors. One of our pastors, who is in a position to know, reports that the same institution, though doing a creditable work, does not do nearly as much as its publicity would indicate. He points out also that the Roman Catholics who solicit such gifts do not support Protestant institutions doing a similar work. He knows how badly his own church needs the financial help that is drained off by such appeals.

We need often to be reminded that we cannot support every good work and we ought to give first consideration to the program we have ourselves helped to launch and etstablish. This is not to say that other causes are less worthy, but rather to suggest that they have other supporters. Our own outreach program depends on our stewardship. And careful stewardship means guarding against wasting our resources by responding to too many outside appeals.—K.M.

"Let the Words of Our Mouths"

NEARLY all our readers will endorse the efforts of two labor leaders to put a stop to cursing and profanity. Their comments are directed to the members of their own union who seem to lack the vocabulary to speak without swearing. They remind their fellow workmen that vulgar language, though common in the armed forces since the days of George Washington, is not unique with soldiers and sailors.

Neither is it unique with laboring men. We used to hear plenty of profanity on university campuses where individuals surely did not lack a more dignified vocabulary if they chose to use it. We have even heard ministers in the pulpit who, without the slightest intention of cursing, have used their own theological terms so loosely and with such emphasis that a layman may have wondered if there were not some ministerial ways of taking the Lord's name in vain.

It is partly a matter of vocabulary, but it may be more a matter of controlling the emotions that seek such an explosive outlet. In either case, the remedy would be to know personally the names that are used in vain. If one really knows God as a forgiving father, if he has met Jesus Christ face to face, if he has discovered the Holy Ghost as a power in his life, can he ever use their names lightly? No vocabulary, good or bad, can substitute for a personal encounter.—K.M.

Join Hands

IN EVERY nation there is a game that children play and a song they sing with it. Of course, the languages are different and the words of the song may vary, but the game is the same. Every child knows Ring-Around-a-Rosy.

In a collection of photographs from sixty-eight nations, now brought together in an exhibit and in a volume called The Family of Man, there are many pictures to prove how universal is this children's game. On a street in a busy American city, in a field in France, by ancient ruins in Italy, on a hillside in Israel, on a level spot in China—or wherever children gather to play, they join their hands, form a circle and hop and skip while they sing.

These same children would just as willingly join hands across the national boundaries and make their circles larger if their elders would give them such encouragement. They are first of all humans, not Americans or Chinese or French or Russians. And it is as humans that they should be regarded, without respect to their citizenship, their color or their language. It is as humans, we believe, that God regards them, for he has no favorites. For their redemption as humans he sent Jesus Christ into the world that whoever would follow him (without respect to nationality) might have eternal life.

When will we learn to look on our brothers around the world with the same unclouded vision children have? When will we learn to join hands with others across boundaries who want also to make the circle of Christians extend around the world? This is no child's game but a holy commission.—K.M.

Signs of Hope for a Revived German Church

Harry K. Zeller, Jr.

THERE are hopeful signs that the church in Germany, described in a previous article can play a more meaningful role in the life of the German people. I shall note at least three aspects of this revival.

First is what we call the Evangelical Academy. The people would not come to the church. A way must be found to take the church to the people. The Evangelical Academy movement developed, a movement which might be described to an American as a cross between a summer camp, a retreat and a cell group. Our party visited the Academy at Loccum, which is under the sponsorship of the Church of Hanover Province. The old monastery at Loccum was refurbished, augmented in its usefulness by the construction of modern dormitories and assembly rooms, thus combining the German love for tradition and modern conveniences. Vocational and professional groups were invited to Loccum. Unit by unit they came to surroundings that were attractive and inspirational.

The groups sat down with good leadership, in classrooms or council circle style—the leaders on the same level as the laity! Discussion was conversational rather than oratorical in manner and the conversation was gradually directed toward two questions: (1) Where did we go wrong? and (2) What does our Lord expect of us at this moment? In an almost miraculous way faith was rekindled in these little groups and people began to feel that life had meaning. They began to read the Bible again. The laity began to insist that the morning sessions at the academy open with an hour study of the Bible. Returning to their home communities, they established little cells in their churches and faith began to grow. The work of the Evangelical Academies was begun in the year 1945 at Bod Boll by Dr. Eberhard Muller and in ten years has grown to be one of the most hopeful and helpful aspects of church life in the new Germany.

Secondly, a great lay leader by the name of von Thadden thought that what the church needed was a public assembly of a giant character to make a dynamic impact upon the apathetic population. He picked up the idea from the Catholics and the first Protestant Kirchentag was held at Hanover in 1948, at which 5,000 people were present. Last year at Leipzig, behind the Iron Curtain and in the Eastern Zone, 650,000 people of all faiths came together for Kirchentag. The church, the only institution which spans the Iron Curtain in Germany, said to the world, "We believe that God matters in life."

Interestingly enough, both the Evangelical Academy movement and Kirchentag were born out of the same concerns. Both had a lay impetus and both were concerned with the standoffishness of the official church in relation to the daily activities of the people. Incidentally, the leadership for both developments had come under the influence of John R. Mott and the Student Volunteer Movement of a generation ago.

The third major factor in the revived church life in Germany is in the creative personalities who are behind these movements. We have already mentioned Muller and von Thadden. Mention ought to be made of Martin Niemöller, who was the first to speak out against Hitler in the prewar time, Niemöller, who said from his Dahlem pulpit, "Adolph Hitler, you are an idol! I will never bow the knee! God is my Führer!" For that word, which echoes the daring of the prophets of old, Niemöller became the personal prisoner of Hitler and was at Dachau concentration camp for eight years, much of that time in solitary confinement.

Also I would mention Bishop Wilm, the young attractive football player type, a big hunk of a man with real charm and genuine ability, who spent two years at Dachau. Probst Gruber, more mature than either of the earlier two, likewise spent two years at Dachau. Otto Dibelius, who had prayers in the Dahlem church every night when Niemöller was in the Dachau concentration camp, is also one of those leaders. These great leaders are beginning to come to the fore in Germany now.

But far and beyond those there is one personality—who must remain nameless and anonymous because he is legion, who is more responsible for the new life in the German church than the greater personalities and the better known individuals—the refugee. This humble refugee, who perforce forsook all earthly possessions and walked into a new country, is doing great things for the church. Church officials confessed that wherever the refugee has come attendance at church has instantly moved upward, interest in things spiritual has revived and new churches have been built.

On our visit to West Berlin the Senate of that divided city provided us with opera tickets, in the salon box so close to the stage, really, that you could almost shake hands with the principals. The program announced the opera Nabucco by Verdi. I recognized Verdi, the dramatist of the operatic composers, but only after looking at the libretto did I discover that Nabucco was Nebuchadnezzar. The opening scene portrayed Nebuchadnezzar sacking Jerusalem and carrying the Hebrews off into captivity. The succeeding scenes were laid in "that hell border city of Babylon." Giant wierd monsters with their great teeth served as props and the king's palace with its hanging gardens spangled the background and the river Euphrates wound off into the distance. The fifth scene opened in darkness, but one sensed that people were on the stage, the deep purple light slowly revealing them lying like tramps along the rivers edge, covered with burlap. The orchestra in the muted tones of the woodwinds was sad beyond death. The huddled people began to sing a low plaintive song. There were tears, not music, in their voices. As their song continued the lights came up slowly. The words had a familiar ring to them.

"By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat down
Yea, we wept, when we remember Zion.
We hanged our harps upon the willows . . .
If I forgot thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning
If I do not remember thee let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth;
If I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy . . .
How shall we sing the Lord's song in a strange land?"

One hundred sixty-four people in a great chorus sang of a sadness that is beyond description. In the center of the chorus stood up a man, the priest, who began to turn their sadness with a note of hope. He reminded them that their faith was in God who made heaven and earth and who would not forget them in their captivity. As the lights came on up to full all 164 were standing, singing the words of hope at the top of their voices, their arms lifted high with the confidence of eventual victory ringing through their voices.

When the curtain was drawn 1,500 people came alive in a moment. They stood up. They knuckled the benches. They clapped their hands. They stamped their feet. They stopped the opera at that point. The director was ready to move ahead but the crowd was not about to let him get away without doing it again!

We returned to our hotel rooms sobered by the experience which was the high point of a wonderful trip. When we began to understand that as many as twenty-five to fifty per cent of the people who listened to Nabucco that night were themselves refugees we sensed they had placed themselves in the heart and soul of those earlier refugees along the Euphrates. Then we understood how great was their agony and how deep was their joy in hearing Nabucco.

We understood also that the laws of God apply not only in ancient Israel, not only to Nazi Germany, but also to modern America. We began to sense anew, what men have always known, that when they go on their own way they breed violence out of greed and hatred. At an awful price they must pay for their sins before they can return to their God.

It could be that the world must needs endure these fierce fires of the judgment of God upon his people when they go wrong in order to remind us all that there is not any way to live without God, no more in our modern technological society than it was in the times of the Old Testament. Out of these testings is revived the vision of a time when every tree with sheltering arms shall be the symbol of peace and joy which comes to the children of men when they live in the will of their God.

stand in eloquent testimony to the democratic process, the sovereignty of the people, upon whom the government depends for the wise and prudent administration of their affairs.

If we would speak up for peace, speak up for justice, law and order, we will reaffirm our faith in the United Nations as an effort toward organizing our world community.

We will remember that faith without works is barren; and so we will work for the translation of the high principles of the U.N.: to save succeeding generations from the source of war; to protect fundamental human rights; to establish conditions of justice; to promote social progress and better standards of life into the substance of a legal order.

We will remember the basic philosophy of our own federal experiment: that to secure the inalienable rights, governments are instituted among men; we will reaffirm the self-evident truth that all men are equal in their claim to these rights.

And so at this decennial year and day, we look forward with increased hope of Tennyson's vision to the day when

The Family Counselor

Naomi Will H. K. Zeller, Jr. Jesse Ziegler

The Family Counselor welcomes letters of inquiry. They may be addressed: Family Life Department, General Brotherhood Board, 22 S. State St., Elgin, Ill.

Dear Counselor,

We have a six-year-old child who has come to be known as a trouble maker both at school and in Sunday school. For over a year now, the teachers give us reports of his tormenting other children, refusing to do his work. They have tried all kinds of threats, rewards and punishments, but to no avail. We have tried to co-operate, but we seem to be getting nowhere with a very moody, unhappy child. It is particularly hard on his younger sister whom he seems to take a particular delight in teasing. When she was born he seemed glad for a sister, but now he is constantly doing things to her, to the point of our not letting him play alone with her while she was still a crib baby. His teacher urges us to see a psychiatrist, but we do not know where to find one and we understand the costs would be high—more than we can afford to pay.

Worried.

Dear Friend,

You are not only worried but you are exasperated quite a bit with your six-year-old boy for the "trouble" he makes.

I suspect you have already found that the more you threaten or punish your boy, the more he tends to pick on the little sister or on other children who are smaller. It is quite usual that a child will simply pass on to those who are smaller and weaker whatever aggression is committed against him by someone who is bigger and stronger.

It would be worth a try, I believe, to attempt a really new start with this lad. For a time stop scolding, punishing and engaging in too much restraint, and begin treating him like "a big boy." Enlist his help with his little sister. Plan some special play times just for him. Have some special times that are completely freed of everything else except just him. It sounds as though his sense of security and worth has been threatened by the presence of a younger sister and perhaps his lack of enough time and love and attention for him. So he finds ways of attracting attention that are very unpleasant.

I suspect that with a radically different approach you will find a complete change in his behavior. If not—then I would go promptly to a child guidance clinic of some kind. Talk to your school principal and ask him about the availability of clinical facilities for children. If he does not know, call your county welfare office and talk to a social case worker. Ask her where to take your child for help.

If you should live in Ohio, Michigan or many other states, there are mental hygiene or child guidance clinics widely scattered and readily available. They are either free or at a cost that will be fitted to your ability to pay. Do not hesitate to use these facilities. They are created precisely to be of help in such problems.

I would also call your attention to a book that would be very helpful for you. Read Dorothy Baruch's New Ways in Discipline.

Jesse H. Ziegler.

P. S. Grandmother, this may answer the similar concern of which you wrote.

The risen Christ brought joy to the despairing disciples and sent them out with hope to proclaim him; he is the answer for the despair and hopelessness today

The Church Can Give an Answer

Otto Dibelius

It is the crucified and risen Christ, in whose name the hungry are fed, the sick healed, the sorrowing comforted and the Good News preached.

NOTHING is more characteristic of the present age than the fact that the peoples have begun to ask. They ask mankind's age-old question, What are we here for any way?

We have passed the stage when each nation could think of itself as the focal point of the whole world, when nations could consider themselves justified in waging war every ten or twenty years in order to increase their power at the expense of weaker neighbors, each time leaving twenty thousand or twenty million men dead on the battlefield. Men are beginning to realize that it is the most vulgar and shoddy of all ambitions, to desire power gained by force over others, whether individuals or nations.

But if that is no longer an aim in life, what is there left?

Nations exploit the resources of their territories. Each would like to be the first to make some new invention, to discover some new source of energy, to push ahead into unknown regions on earth or in outer space. But each can see that though something new were discovered every day, there would still be no end to the question: What, in the last resort, is the point of our national existence?

Or must the energies of each nation be concentrated on the production of a perfect welfare state, a society in which material want is done away with since everyone is secure against everything, since every material need is taken care of from the cradle to the grave? Now, something of this general kind is bound to come in the future. But is there one among us who thinks that this would make the life of the nations happy and meaningful?

Or have we come so far that the nations now have no meaning, but are simply subdivisions in a great, undifferentiated sprawl of humanity? It might also seem so. Factors making for the uniformity of mankind are fast increasing. When buildings were erected in centuries past, everyone knew that a structure like the Kremlin could occur only in Russia, that St. Peter's could only be in Rome, and the Alhambra only in Spain. But with the buildings of today —waterworks, atomic piles, technical colleges—one can never tell whether the building properly belongs in Russia or America, in Rio de Janeiro or in Calcutta. Our ways of speech are becoming ever more technical and standardized, our interests are becoming standardized, our modes of dress are becoming standardized, our very thoughts are becoming standardized. Does it not seem that the time is near when the five continents will be peopled by a single, leveled-out mass of humanity?

Thus, the question of the nations of our time. And since no answer comes, they ask the church. And I think that the church can and will provide an answer.

The peoples ask. The church answers

She can answer only with the gospel. For the gospel is the only thing that she has. And this is the answer which the gospel gives: God has placed the nations in the world "that they should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after him, though he be not far from everyone of us."

When the Apostle Paul first gave this answer of the church there was no laughter from his learned listeners. They laughed when, a little later, he spoke of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ; but this answer seemed to them worthy of their consideration.

But there was something that they missed completely. It was this, that the church's answers do not try to recommend themselves to men's logical faculties. God's answer is always a call, an appeal, an inspiration. That the nations should seek the Lord does not mean that they should become "God-seekers," as in Germany fifty years ago when it was fashionable to sit on one's sofa waiting for ecstatic and elevated visions—and thus moving ever further from the living God. "If haply they might feel after him and find him," said Paul. In the original text the statement is even more concrete, even more blunt: "if they might feel for him and grasp him and in that way find him."

That means, therefore: build your atomic piles and spaceships, turn the deserts of the earth into blossoming gardens, conduct microbiological research into the origins of diseases—each nation in its own way according to its own talents and resources. But remember that it is God who permits you gradually to enter into the innermost secrets of his creation. So sing his praises in humility and gratitude!

Accept the standardization of human life if this is just a symptom of the technical age in which we live. Standardization will do you no harm, as long as the uniform world stands in obedience to the uniform commands of God, so that his will may be done in righteousness and truth.

World Council of Churches

One of the factors in the revived church life of Germany are the leaders behind the movement; one of these leaders is Bishop Otto Dibelius, head of the Evangelical Church of Germany (EKID)

Make your welfare state. But do not forget that there is a distinction between a hospital's being a repair shop for the maintenance of a country's labor force and its being a place in which care is given to the bodies of all the sick, whether they be young or old, rich or poor. Do not forget that it makes a difference whether the upbringing of the young develops in them a readiness to help those who are in need, or whether everything is left to welfare departments which have written over their doors the words: Please Deposit Your Soul in the Cloakroom.

"Where love is, there God is also!" said Tolstoy in an epigraph to one of his folk tales. Where love counts for anything, there we may "feel and find" God. There the question as to the meaning of life is no longer heard, becoming instead a grateful song of praise.

That is the answer of the church.

There is just one thing which she must add to it: "You will not succeed alone, nor shall we!" We know well enough what is wrong with us. That, indeed, is why we come together, so that our churches may learn from one another how to make our faith more rich, our love more burning, our obedience to God's laws more perfect—so that better than before, more acceptably than before we may be able to present to men this new source of inspiration.

But there is One to whom nothing is impossible and to whom we therefore pray that he may appear before the nations as he who can heal all the world's ills and put to rest all its questions. This One is called Jesus Christ.

May I recall the splendid words which Charles Malik, a Near Eastern delegate to the United Nations, spoke to us at Evanston and of which we were, in a moving hour, recently reminded?

What the Eastern world needs, he said, is something other than what it has so far been offered, "something infinitely more humble, more profound, more positively outreaching, something touching the hearts of men, touching their need for fellowship and understanding and love, for being included and being trusted, something providing them with real hope, hope for themselves and their children, hope in this life as well as in the next; something of this order is needed. This Something is Jesus Christ, the risen Lord."

Yes, the peoples ask, the church answers and her answer is Jesus Christ, the crucified and risen Lord, praised in all ages.

The Lord Is My Shepherd

Bertha Harman

THE insistent ringing of the telephone roused me from a fitful sleep. Instinctively I glanced at my watch as I got quickly out of bed. It was 5:40 a.m.

I hurried down the stairs, my heart beating heavily, painfully. Reaching the telephone, I picked it up.

"Hello," I said.

"Mrs. Harman?"

"Yes."

"This is the hospital."

"Yes?"

"Your husband's condition is much worse. In the last ten minutes he's been failing rapidly."

"Is the doctor there?"

"No. We have done everything he advised, and there just isn't anything———" the voice trailed off.

"We'll be there."

A cold numbness crept over me as, with a shaking hand, I replaced the phone. I turned to find my mother-in-law standing behind me, her stricken eyes asking a mute question. My father-in-law stood on the landing, halfway down the stairs.

"He's worse," I said. "We had better go right away."

I don't remember dressing or what I wore; I only remember it seemed a long time before we were all ready. Not a word was spoken during the short drive to the hospital.

Walking into the hospital, we were aware of the familiar odor which we had come to know so well in the week since the accident: the mingled scent of ether, antiseptics and cleaning compounds. The clock above the desk in the hall showed the time to be 5:55 a.m.

Even before we entered the room I knew we were too late, for there was no reassuring hiss from the oxygen tank, and the transfusion apparatus stood in the hall. The nurse met us at the door.

"He just passed away," she said. She went quietly down the hall.

I looked at the gaunt figure in the high, white bed, the head swathed in a bandage which resembled an old-fashioned stocking cap, the hollow eyes staring fixedly toward the door as though watching for someone. I heard Mom's muffled sobs as Dad gently led her from the room.

I moved around the bed so that I might look on the uninjured side of my husband's face. I touched his cheek with my fingertips. The warmth of the life so recently fled still lingered. I kissed his cheek and felt the harsh stubble of beard against my lips. My hands clutched the thick, hard cast encasing his broken left arm, and I bowed my head as the hot tears came at last. They were not tears for him who had so mercifully been released from a painful, uncertain future; they were tears for all the lonely years to come, for the little children who must grow to maturity without a father's love and for the hopes and dreams now lost and broken.

How long I stood there I do not know. I do recall praying for courage and strength to face whatever lay ahead. Then, from deep within me, I seemed to hear a small, calm voice repeating over and over, "The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want."

Slowly, and without looking back, I walked out of the room and closed the door.

That was a little over two years ago. Today I am nearing the completion of my sophomore year at Ashland College, well on my way to becoming an elementary school teacher. It has not been easy, but the Good Shepherd has never deserted us.

Seven months after my husband's death the baby, then fourteen months old, was rushed to the hospital with bronchial pneumonia. In four days he was home again; in a few weeks he was well and strong again, in time for me to enter college as a part-time student.

That winter was my daughter's first year in school, and we experienced most of the childhood diseases, starting in October with mumps, progressing in January to measles, and ending up some time in April with chicken pox. I had been out of high school for a good many years, but somehow I managed to look after three sick children and still make good grades at college. On my own? No—my Shepherd made it possible, giving me both strength and knowledge.

Last July my daughter became ill with a sore throat and an upset stomach. After two days of treatment for these two ailments she complained of a stiff neck and her temperature began to rise. A spinal tap confirmed our worst suspicions—she had polio! She was sent immediately to Children's Hospital in Akron, which is a little over fifty miles from our home, the two little boys were given their painful shots of gamma globulin, the quarantine sign was posted on the house, and life took on a strange, new routine which revolved around a daily trip to Akron.

Had the Shepherd forgotten us? Not for one minute! The good people of our church not only helped pay for gasoline to make the daily trip but hired a woman to stay with the boys while I was gone. Most wonderful of all, my little girl's polio proved to be a mild case. With the excellent care she received and with all the prayers that were offered for her, she was home within a month and was sufficiently recovered to enter school in September.

Then, in October, I suffered an injury to my right eye. The pain was terrific, and for two days I was confined to bed. Friends came in to care for the children and me and, when for two weeks I could not see to read, other friends came in to read assignments to me so I would not fall behind in my studies. Slowly, miraculously the eye healed and became as good as new.

The Lord has indeed been our Shepherd; we have never known real want. When there was no money for clothes, gifts of good used clothing came from the church and other friends. When there were insufficient funds to meet first-of-the-year expenses my Sunday-school class presented us with a generous cash gift. Kind friends care for my little ones while I attend college classes.

Of course, being human, I have my days of doubt and dark despair, of which I am thoroughly ashamed when I consider the goodness of God. With all the proof I have had that because the Lord is my Shepherd I shall not want, I can say with confidence, "I will fear no evil," as I follow that Shepherd into the unfolding future.

COME UNTO ME

JOHN HOWARD BLOUGH

His heart spoke, "Come unto me"—
Folks came.
Behold these seven:
The links which bound one man to earth broke,
For those chains were no match against the Master's love.

The forgiven heart of another leaped for joy
As the man outran his guilt
And clasped the Master.

The venerable soul found
Life's glorious sunset at the feet of Christ—
"Now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace acording to thy word for mine eyes have seen thy salvation."

How the mother besought him
For hers was three souls
With two more precious than her own.
Christ magnified her parenthood.

Twice blest the maiden—
With a mother's care
And Christ's unfathomable love
To nurture her growing life.

The Churches and the Tenth Anniversary of the United Nations

AT THE same moment of history, man was given both new secrets of the atom and new means for achieving a just and lasting peace. We celebrate the tenth birthday of the United Nations in Year Ten of the Atomic Age.

The question of our times is whether mankind under God can find the will and the wisdom to use the means for peace to make of the atomic era an age of peace. We who have taken upon ourselves the name of Christ are determined to press toward this goal with undiminished zeal.

We see in war a disease of international society. Conditions of poverty together with the disregard of human rights and freedoms create conflict. Terror and subversion, used as instruments of national policy, breed tension. The quest for power and the striving for a position of dominance among the nations, threaten peace. Competitive armaments together with primary reliance upon military establishments engender fear. These are among the causes of war. The abolition of war will be hastened as we pursue practical means for curing its causes.

We of the churches reaffirm what we said ten years ago, even before the Charter was signed: "A new will to collaborate must be born in the hearts and minds of men if the organization is to fulfill its purpose. Lacking such a will to make the machinery work, a better organization than that proposed in the Charter would fail. There is no substitute for the will to peace and justice."

Major developments in the world since the signing of the Charter in 1945 all underscore the role of the United Nations in the maintenance of peace. It is sometimes said that because many of the hopes of San Francisco have not been fully realized, the United Nations has ceased to have meaning or reality. We hold the opposite view to be true, that the United Nations is now more clearly seen as sheer necessity to avoid international anarchy and war.

Who dares to say that because science has complicated and made more acute the problems of peace, we should now abandon the very machinery for seeking peace? We cannot escape simply by letting frustration drive us into a dark cave.

Instead, we must persevere in our efforts through the United Nations to find effective means for achieving disarmament. Such efforts reflect our abiding concern in attaining a peaceful world. They are dictated by our awareness that although any system of regulation of arms may involve some risk of evasion, the continuance of the arms race involves the greatest risk of all—total disaster. It is our fervent prayer that, through the United Nations, our country will persist in its search for a trustworthy system of disarmament and thus make crystal clear our desire to build a world in which nations can practice tolerance and live with one another without fear and without threat of war.

We, therefore, conclude that the advances in nuclear science since the San Francisco Conference make it imperative that our own and other nations find the means of using nuclear energy for peaceful purposes, and that to this end effective use be made of the United Nations.

Another important development since the signing of the Charter has been the upsurge of nationalist movements in the world. Thirteen new sovereignties have been born since the end of the war. The United Nations plays an important role in advancing man's natural aspirations for liberty without resort to armed conflict. Where hostilities have broken out, they have been first confined and then ended through the arbitrament of the world organization for peace.

Moreover, in vast areas—close to us because they are on the same planet—a new force has been born which matches the new found power of the atom. This is the growing determination of the individual person to find a fuller expression and to give a greater meaning to his life on God's earth. The ancient tyrannies of hunger, disease and poverty are no longer to be suffered in hopeless despair.

The United Nations and its specialized agencies can serve as prime instruments in the orderly satisfaction of these demands. We deplore the tendency to consider these problems as an isolated segment of policy unrelated to the so-called "political" problems.

The economic and the social foundations of justice are indispensable to the peace and stability of the free world. Along with the humanitarian aspect, which as Christians we hold to be supreme, it is also in our highest self-interest to support adequate United Nations technical assistance and other programs of mutual help. Only in this way will the voice of freedom be more convincing than the promises of communism.

The hopes held at San Francisco that the great powers might co-operate to build the structure of peace have been thwarted by the emerg-

The boy—
So much to learn
So innocent of evil
So trustful of the Master
To whom his mother brought him
Favored with heaven's blessing.

And Mrs. Worldly Wiseman
Peering through the shadows,
"A-ha, what do you know about the market place?"
Glares his contempt.

Christ's arms are still outstretched.
I also call, "Come unto Christ."
But my words are hollow
For my heart does not overflow with love.
Christ didn't talk people into his kingdom,
He loved them into it.
And may he reinforce
The tiny flow in the fountain of my soul
That mine may become a stream of life to all who hear—
A channel for the Master's words, ence of the cold war. Communist policies and threats to the peace have misled some into urging that the United Nations should be modified or disbanded. They hold that there is not enough room in the United Nations for both the free and the communist nations. To them we answer that an organization for world peace must be large enough for the whole world to fit into. We believe that world problems can be lessened as the organization for dealing with them is made more, not less inclusive.
"Come unto me."

Within the framework of the United Nations, governments have been binding themselves together in regional and other defense arrangements for the preservation of the common good. However, these arrangements can forge moral unity and thus build real strength for peace, only if they serve in fact as well as in name to support the security provisions of the UN.

Above all, we of the churches proclaim that the United Nations is both a symbol and a method for strengthening the foundations of freedom, peace and security in the world; that it can help fulfill the promise of those "unalienable rights" with which the Creator has endowed his children. We believe that mankind, under God, is one; that he in whose image we are made summons us to persevere in the task of achieving for our own and other nations that peace and concord that are the fruits of world community.

In My Garden

FLORENCE M. BOLLINGER

Some reckon their wealth in lands and flocks,
In jewels rare or bonded stocks;
I have a garden; I tend it with care,
Because the Lord of life is there.

Blue skies o'er head,
The sun shining through,
Birds sing in tree tops,
The rain falls and dew.

Why should I seek for worldly store,
Earthy striving for more and more,
When out in my garden there's enough and to spare,
Because the Lord of life is there?

I count the colors, a symphony rare
In fruits of the earth and flowers fair:
Red, gold and green, bronze, yellow and white,
Flame-pink and lavendar, richly bright.

There's food for my hunger, rest for my soul,
Delight for the eye—a full-brimming bowl!
I forget I am weary, I cast away care,
When I walk with the Lord in my garden there.

After darkness, like light in radiant hue,
All clouds disappear; I feel I'm made new!
When in clear ringing tones, I hear the Lord call,
"Come out in the garden, we've work to do!"

A Sunday at Schwarzenau

William M. Beahm

ON SUNDAY, September 4, 1955, a large busload of Brethren and associated workers in the European program brought their annual conference to a close in Kassel, Germany, and drove along the Eder River to the beautiful village among the hills, Schwarzenau. The day was set apart to transfer a gift of 60,000 Deutsches Mark from the Church of the Brethren to the community at Schwarzenau toward the completion of the new school named after Alexander Mack. The somber slate buildings of the town were environed by lush green fields and all was overarched by a kodachrome sky. After attending the morning service in the village church, the visiting guests were all entertained in the homes of the local members. In the afternoon all gathered in the village hall for a special service to present the gift and to celebrate the common interests of the Church of the Brethren and this ancient and thriving community.

The program included musical numbers by both the Schwarzenau choir and a choir from the Kassel annual conference. There were addresses of varied length by Pastor Mueller of the local church; Burgomaster Gottschalck, Pastor Puffert of the Evangelischer Hilfswerk; Pastor Wagner, missionary preacher of the morning; and Oberkreisdirektor Richter on behalf of the area schools, as well as by W. Harold Row, William M. Beahm and M. R. Zigler. The gift was transferred by M. R. Zigler to Mr. Richter with the following statement:

To the Community of Schwarzenau,
Wittgenstein, Germany

We who are privileged to represent the Church of the Brethren in America on this significant occasion are humbly grateful and pleased to meet with you on this first Sunday afternoon in September of the year 1955 of our blessed Lord, in the beautiful Eder valley of Westphalia. We have been blessed by joining with you this morning in the worship of God. We have also enjoyed the kind hospitality of your homes. Now we join in celebrating the long and happy relationship between this community and the Church of the Brethren.

In the year 1708, eight people of this community, including Alexander Mack, George Grebi, Lucas Vetter, Andreas Boney, Johannes Kipping, Johanna Noethiger Boney, Anna Margaretha Mack and Johanna Kipping organized themselves into a society known locally as Neutaeufer. They had spent time together in Bible study and prayer and felt led to seal their covenant by immersion in this beautiful, flowing stream. They regarded the New Testament as their rule of faith and practice. They sought to keep faithfully the ordinances of the early church, and to order their daily lives according to the expressed principles of Jesus Christ our Lord.

These eight had suffered religious persecution in other places where they had lived and they were deeply grateful to the ruling house of Wittgenstein for giving them a refuge where they could practice their religious and social life in freedom. They conceived religion as a way of life. They believed that there should be no force in religion and that they should commit themselves to brotherhood and peace. Schwarzenau has always remained a cherished place for us because here in this hospitable community our movement and brotherhood was born.

After founding several nearby congregations, most of these people migrated to America by 1729 in response to the opportunities for livelihood and freedom of worship in that new land. They settled first around Germantown, Pennsylvania, but soon new congregations were established further inland. From this beginning the movement spread across America and into Western Canada. It has had a slow but steady growth until the present time when it has some 200,000 members who worship in about one thousand congregations. Missions have been established in India, China, Africa, South America and the West Indies.

The Church of the Brethren believes that the redemption God gives us in Jesus Christ includes the privileges and obligations to live in brotherhood and in peace. They have sought through the years to refrain from participation in warfare. This conviction has led them to do all they can to help prevent war, but if war comes to provide a ministry of love and mercy, through material aid and brotherhood to the victims of war, in the name and spirit of Christ, and without regard to race, creed or nationality. This concern has brought the Brethren back to Europe and to the ends of the earth.

At the 1955 Annual Conference of the Church of the Brethren, held at Grand Rapids, Michigan, it was officially decided to appropriate 60,000 D.M. to help the Schwarzenau community in their efforts to erect a new school building to provide for every child the very best education possible as a preparation for life.

This gift, therefore, is presented to this community today, September 4, 1955, as an expression of our appreciation for all this community means to the members of the Church of the Brethren, and in the fervent hope and faith that God's love will bind all Christians together and that there will never again be war among us, and that lasting peace will come to the whole earth, in the name of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

There was deep appreciation for the gift and also clear indication that the people of the community intended to use it well in enlarging and enriching their education program. A mood of goodwill was manifest and, in celebrating what Schwarzenau and the Church of the Brethren have meant to each other, there emerged a common purpose to continue to enrich our relationship. This served well as a prelude to our 250th anniversary plans for 1958.

The alarm sounds at Plainview

Plainview's Awakening

C. Ernest Davis

PLAINVIEW'S AWAKENING is a sound filmstrip that tells the story of a church that was creeping along in an easy-going, comfortable, half-awake manner, characteristic of all too many congregations, and of what happened when it was rudely awakened by one of its boys getting into trouble through a breach of the law. The congregation's attempt to help Bob Wright not only transformed the boy, but the church as well until, as one of the members said, "Plainview looks different to me now . . . and I like what I see."

You will be interested to discover how many angles there are to a church's program, how many things there are that can be done and how many people and resources are available to help do what is needed.

Plainview's Awakening is the sound filmstrip of the year and interprets that phase of the General Brotherhood Board's program which is carried by the Christian Education Commission. It is in the series of interpretive filmstrips which began with My Peace I Give Unto You and continued with A Chance to Live, Frontiers Near Home and Unto These, My Brethren.

Plainview's Awakening will not only serve to interpret an important phase of our Brotherhood program; it will also give practical guidance to churches in several aspects of their Christian education work. In other words, it has some value as a training instrument. There are seventy-seven frames in the filmstrip proper and seven frames on a trailer which may be used for promoting discussion. The filmstrip comes complete with a 33 1/3 rpm record, a user's guide and, if desired, a quantity of hand-out leaflets which can be used by the audience to check the adequacy of the congregation's own Christian education program.

This filmstrip will make possible an excellent Sunday evening service and also has many possibilities for use with smaller groups.

Rental of this filmstrip is free. It can also be purchased complete for $5. Some congregations will want to have it in their library of audio-visual resources because of its rather permanent interpretive and training values. Send your order for renting or purchase at once to Audio-Visual Service, 22 S. State St., Elgin, Ill.

An Alcoholic to His Sons. As told to Henry Bettle Hough. Simon and Schuster. 245 pages. $3.50.

Here is a personal story of descent into alcoholism and a gradual comeback to a normal happy life told in clear detail, giving the reader knowledge and understanding of an alcoholic.

The reader will learn to know the teller and will feel that he has shaken the hands of acquaintance with him. Other personalities are introduced so as to give the many sided problems of alcoholics. Facts are not only stated, but the reader is taken on the road of experience which turns in and out around a bottle. The explanation of Alcoholics Anonymous will be enlightening to many.

If anyone wants to help an alcoholic or understand the problem he should not overlook this book.—Melvin S. Ritchey, Milledgeville, Ill.

Careers in Religious Journalism. Roland E. Wolseley. Association Press, 1955. 116 pages. $2.50.

What are the opportunities for Christian service in religious journalism? The best single answer to that question is this recent book by the professor of journalism at Syracuse University. He has the most complete information concerning job openings, educational requirements, possibilities for growth and advancement in religious journalism that can be found anywhere. This information comes alive in dozens of brief biographical sketches, case histories of religious journalists who have demonstrated that their work is a Christian calling.

Special attention is given to the duties of religious newswriters for all kinds of publications, religious or church editors, publicity directors and missionary journalists. Although the financial rewards for religious journalists are quite modest, there is an increasing number of talented and dedicated young people who are making this their vocation. They will find this small book an indispensable guide toward discovering the exciting ministry of the printed page.—Kenneth I. Morse.

Highways of Worship. Mary Beth Fulton. Judson Press, 1955. 95 pages. $2.00.

Here is a book of worship suggestions with meditations which are rich yet simple, comprehensive yet intimate, devout yet scholarly, ecumenical, yet the fruit of one gracious and talented woman's spiritual pilgrimage. This book would be very helpful to women's and youth groups.

The author is a Baptist, who has traveled widely and reached eminence as a leader of worship.—Edward K. Ziegler, Roanoke, Va.

KINGDOM GLEANINGS

Achievement offerings lifted Brotherhood Fund giving for the past fiscal year to the highest level since the peak year of 1946, according to Harl Russell, Brotherhood Fund-stewardship secretary.

Receipts for 1954-55 totaled $1,217,490, an increase of $13,727 over the previous year. Marking the fifth year in which giving for the Brotherhood has increased, the gain amounted to an increment of one per cent. The 1946 peak in Brotherhood giving amounted to $1,261,005.

The General Brotherhood Board and staff are grateful to all who shared in this enlarged program. The 1955-56 goal calls for $1,325,000. A requirement for greater sharing, and thus a greater ministry for the kingdom, is a boldness by individuals in practicing Biblical truths on stewardship.

First church, Canton, Ohio, will have a spiritual life emphasis meeting, beginning Friday evening, Oct. 28, and closing Sunday evening, Oct. 30. Earl H. Kurtz, manager of the Brethren Publishing House, Elgin, Ill., will be the guest minister.

A copy of The Lost Sisters Among the Miamis, by Otho Winger, is wanted by Amos O. Brubaker, The Cedars, 1111 E. Kansas Ave., McPherson, Kansas. If anyone has a copy of this book that he is willing to dispose of, please write Bro. Brubaker at the address given.

Word comes that First church, Canton, Ohio, is answering the challenge of Annual Conference to double Brotherhood Fund giving by 1958 through adopting an increase of 25% in the Brotherhood Fund local budget with that rate of increase to continue each of the next four years.

The District of Michigan has launched an extensive stewardship program of which Bro. Lloyd Evans is director. The following workshops on stewardship education have been scheduled: Oct. 28, for pastors, Rodney church; Dec. 3, Lakeview Brethren church; Dec. 10, Crystal church; Dec. 17, Flint church.

The S. M. Dells of McPherson, Kansas, are back at their work at McPherson College after some months working with Brethren Service in Europe. They wish to express their appreciation to those who responded so quickly after their home was destroyed by an explosion. The Dells feel that in spite of their loss they have "gained some spiritual blessings which likely cannot come any other way."

A total of seven bachelor of arts and six bachelor of science degrees were awarded at a dinner ceremony on Aug. 26, the thirtieth summer commencement in Juniata College history. Ten men and three women were among the graduates. This ceremony also marked the end of the summer session at Juniata.

Precollege opening conferences of both the faculty and student leaders began Friday, Sept. 9, prior to the official opening of Juniata College's fall term. The faculty met on campus while the students held their conference at Camp Kanesatake in Spruce Creek Valley. Nearly 225 freshmen arrived Sept. 11, for a four-day orientation period prior to the beginning of classes.

Five employees of Juniata College were honored at a dinner given Sept. 6, for "faithful service to the college." CWS Reports on 1955 Surplus Food Shipments Church World Service, relief agency of the National Council of Churches, expects to distribute nearly 142,000,000 pounds of government surplus foods to needy people overseas this year. Total value of the scheduled 1955 shipments—a large part of which already have been sent out—will be about $49,500,000. The cost to Church World Service will be about $1,000,000. The foods themselves are supplied free by the American government. The food expected to be sent during 1955 would, if loaded in freight cars, make a train more than forty miles long.

UN Delegates Get Memorandum on Church Concerns

Disarmament and related processes of peaceful settlement and change were stressed in a memorandum sent to 600 United Nations delegates by the New York office of the Commission of the Churches and International Affairs. The statement summarizes the issue of concern to churches that will be discussed by the tenth session of the UN General Assembly. It also was sent to church leaders in seventy countries. The commission memorandum also emphasized technical and financial assistance for underdeveloped countries, action to safeguard human rights, measures to care for and resettle refugees, the application of the principle of self-determination and the question of universality of UN membership.

Warning Sounded on Boom in Religion

America's boom in religion, as measured by church membership and other statistics, may be a spiritual bust. This is the warning sounded by Dr. Eugene Carson Blake, president of the National Council of Churches in a recent issue of Look magazine. He said, "The concern of the churches is that there appears to be a growing interest in what religion can do for a man, without an accompanying moral concern about what a religious man ought to be and do."

Canadian Church Organists Ask for Raise

More than 200 Canadian church organists tactfully asked their employers for a raise. They pointed out in a conference that many of them were receiving only $900 a year for highly skilled efforts. The Canadian College of Organists pondered the best method of drawing their plight to the attention of congregations. The delegates said their uncomplaining profession had trailed other groups for years and since the beginning of World War II had been left far behind.

Medical Survey Being Made in Central Africa

A seven-man medical expedition is enroute on the first helicopter crossing of central Africa, concentration area for some of the world's most serious diseases. On-the-spot medical surveys will be made in the Belgian Congo, Ruanda-Urundi, Kenya and Tanganyika. The five weeks' expedition is working in cooperation with some thirty Protestant and Roman Catholic missions. More than $100,000 worth of modern drugs will be distributed to mission stations to help fight local disease and infection.

Assemblies of God Plan Headquarters Building

Plans for $3,000,000 Assemblies of God headquarters building at Springfield, Mo., were revealed at the denomination's 26th biennial convention. The new structure will be five stories high, contemporary in design and built of glass and aluminum. It will be an addition to the church's publishing house quarters, already established at Springfield at a cost of around $1,600,000.

Waldensians Move Toward Union With Methodists

A proposal that ecclesiastical union with the Italian Methodist Church be effected immediately pending organic union was made at the annual meeting of the Waldensian Church Synod in Italy. The 130 ministerial and lay delegates adopted a resolution stipulating that the word Waldensian be included in the name of the united church out of deference to its history as the world's oldest Protestant body. The synod also urged increased co-operation among Protestant groups in Italy. It particularly suggested further efforts towards the formation of an Italian Evangelical Union that would integrate the work of the evangelical groups in the country.

Millions Will Join in Worldwide Bible Reading

Starting Thanksgiving Day and continuing through Christmas, thousands of families will be reading identical passages of Scripture from the greatest chapters in the Bible. People in over forty countries will follow the twelfth annual observance of Worldwide Bible Reading, sponsored each year by the American Bible Society. Again this year the Society has prepared the passages in Braille so that sightless people may join with others in following the readings.

Approve Unitarian-Universalist Merger Commission

Appointment of a merger commission to effect eventual union of the American Unitarian Association and the Universalist Church of America was overwhelmingly voted by the Council of Liberal Churches at its first biennial convention. The Council itself was created by a vote of the conventions of the two denominations in August 1953, as a major step toward federal union of the two churches. Delegates believe it will take several years to accomplish the union which will join 100,000 Unitarians and 79,000 Universalists.

An American jurist told the United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders that eighty-five per cent of all juvenile delinquents come from homes where the parents have no church affiliation. Baltimore Work Camp

Eve Cameron

ANY hot summer evening brings the population of Baltimore out on its doorsteps, from grandmother to babe in arms. But the collection of people who sat on the steps of 1038 North Broadway was unusual, because its variations were not just those of age. Most would be classified as young adults, but their differences lay in their pasts and in their futures: farmers, secretaries, teachers, students, sales clerks. Two of the group were regular BVS'ers, who were working in the Baltimore project for a whole year; three were assigned here for their alternative service; one was the wife of a 1-W, and the other six were work campers, plain and simple, who had paid for the privilege of being there. But whatever the method by which the steps were reached, all twelve seated on them were inspired by the ideal of trying to put Christian love into practice.

There were a number of ways in which that was accomplished. The Baltimore project was originally established in conjunction with the Baltimore Plan of slum rehabilitation. Therefore an important part of the work is connected with better housing. When the unit was first established in 1951, it rehabilitated a veritable hovel of a house, not only as an example of what can be done to improve old dwellings, but also as a center for people to come to with problems. Some of these are physical—an elderly widow needs to have her cellar concreted, or the busy father of a large family needs help with his plastering. Work campers' muscles solve problems like these. Others are referral cases. People need legal aid in dealing with contractors or landlords, or need to be told about the help obtainable from Public Welfare. Some who come are in such desperate straits that they need groceries or clothing immediately without waiting for the city red tape to unwind.

All this has been happening in east Baltimore, but now the city is planning a great rehabilitation program for the Harlem Park section in west Baltimore. Therefore a major summer project was work on a second Pilot House for the new area, to fulfill the same functions of example and service that the first one has. The work campers dug a seven-foot-deep trench for the plumbing, tore down partitions, built a chimney, scraped wallpaper, erected a fence, prepared the cellar for concreting, and in general did a great deal to make the place eventually habitable.

In the meantime the needs of neighbors were not neglected and work campers also patched, rebuilt, concreted and, in general, tried to make houses more sanitary and safe for those who could not pay regular contractors.

The work campers contribution to the new West Pilot House included the digging of a trench seven feet deep for plumbing

A typical scene of the street shower which the Baltimore summer work campers supervised during the hottest days of the summer

Eve Cameron of Concord, Massachusetts, was one of the workcampers who helped renovate the building which will serve as a Pilot House for the rehabilitation program in west Baltimore

Sound houses are not the complete answer to all the problems caused by city dwelling. Building sound children matters, too. The work camp, therefore—and the year-round unit—lay great stress on recreation. The campers helped supervise playgrounds in both east and west Baltimore. A daily street shower was one of the most popular recreational activities—for both campers and children—in the record July heat. The campers also worked closely with the summer program of the Knox Presbyterian church, as an obvious way of helping people help themselves. For the mornings of three weeks, five of the campers screwed up their courage to face rapidly increasing hordes of children at Bible school, hoping to be able to instil some idea of Christ's love by precept, even if the recreational aspect of the program seemed more popular among their students than the educational.

Service is a vital part of a work camp program, but it is not the only one. Each camp has its internal life as well as the external one of projects. Worship, education and recreation, by binding the group closer together, help the individual grow, besides making the work of the camp more effective. There were several aspects to the worship. Three mornings a week started off with a brief service, led by the campers in turn. The weekly "business meeting"—often held after a picnic—would end in prayer.

The educational program was largely informal—the new ideas inevitable in such surroundings and the spontaneous bull session. But there was a formal program, too. The camp started off with some orientation sessions on housing, past and future, in Baltimore, and tours of some of the more outstanding areas—both good and bad. During the summer there were talks by other persons who were trying, in different ways, to relieve the misery of the slums. There were also field trips to see city agencies in action.

Altogether, the summer was a rich and varied one. It left a physical imprint on several homes in Baltimore; we hope that the cheerful service made some kind of impact on the over two hundred children and adults with whom the campers came in contact. Certainly none of the campers could leave with quite the same attitudes with which he came. Sweat, laughter and prayer are great dissolvers of barriers of all sorts; they open many windows for the soul.

A volunteer gives a Bible lesson to a Chinese mother

Eugene Moy

CHINESE -- AMERICAN?

Shirley McCracken

CHINESE people come, in great numbers, to America to live because there are so many more opportunities here. These are the conditions which they find; our language, culture and religion are very different. Many of them have never heard of the Bible. Imagine the adjustments they have to make.

As a BVS'er I am here for one year to try to help them. They are very shy at first, but it does not take long for them to learn that the BVS'ers are their friends and they try hard to converse with us. It does not take long, either, for us to learn to understand each other by way of signs and simple words. The Chinese are sweet-natured and friendly people, eager to learn and grateful for all that is done for them.

What is my work? I am assigned to nineteen ladies; I go into their homes and teach English. Some of them learned some English during their education in China, so I answer their many questions about our country and customs, and work with them to help them speak more fluent English.

After one of our Chinese ladies has learned enough English, we begin giving her Bible and citizenship lessons. They love to hear the Bible stories and verses and usually they want to learn hymns in English, too. I am helping some of my ladies learn to cook American food, and they are very grateful for this.

Their home life is different from ours, but they are eager to do things as we do them and they learn quickly. Most of the men have been here longer than the women and they are better acquainted with the English language and American ways than are the women.

We also work in the nursery at the church in Chinatown. About fifty little children spend two hours in it each day. The children are lovable; some of them speak English and others do not, but usually they can make us understand what they want.

On Sunday afternoons we have Chinese Sunday school at First church, Chicago. I teach the nursery class. The young people have organized their group and they are doing good work. There is not as much interest as there should be yet, but we are still hoping and praying. They have never had an experience like this before.

This is a project in which we are on our own, going from home to home in all parts of the city. Making the lessons interesting and helpful and teaching the Christian way is up to us, the teachers. I think this is a wonderful opportunity for making a real Christian witness.

Shirley McCracken of Jonesboro, Tennessee, is spending her year of Brethren Volunteer Service working with the Chinese in Chicago.

The Place of the Junior Choir in the Church

Mildred M. Etter

THE first consideration of this article will deal with the question, Why have a junior choir or children's choir in the church? Naturally, the first reason to be mentioned is that of training the children musically. But since most children these days have excellent music training experiences in the public schools, this obviously is not the main purpose of organizing a junior choir in a local church. However, the junior choir does offer an excellent opportunity for children to cultivate a taste for good hymn literature and good singing.

A junior choir gives children an opportunity to feel that they are a vital part of the church fellowship. They feel they definitely "belong" and that they have responsibilities similar to those of older members of the church. Children in a choir, while being taught good music, learn the meaning of worship and how to worship. They develop an appreciation for a worshipful atmosphere. They willingly accept their responsibility for helping to develop that spirit when they have a part in the worship service.

How start a junior choir? Each local church music committee or board of Christian education must study its own situation before this question can be answered. The number of children within the church fellowship will determine to a large extent the range of ages in the choir. Best results are achieved when the junior choir includes grades three or four through six. Younger children are not ready emotionally or spiritually to appreciate music suitable for these grades, while junior high children are ready for more advanced music.

In churches where the number of children may be too few within this range of four years, a choir for children of grades one to seven could be organized satisfactorily. In such instances, the older children can help drill the younger ones on words of the songs. In this way, the older choir members feel a certain responsibility which compensates their feeling that the music is often too easy. The music for such a group in most instances will be geared to the middle of the age range.

The junior choir provides children the opportunity to feel that they are a vital part of the church fellowship as they lead in worship

Another possibility would be to use children of grades one to four in one choir and those in grades five to eight in another choir. A choir need not be large in order to function. Perhaps eight to ten would be a reasonable minimum. Choirs that enjoy singing will create the desire within others to become members of the group.

The choir leaders

A very important decision in beginning a junior choir is the availability of a capable and consecrated leader. A man or woman who has, first of all, a great love for children and senses their true worth in the life of the church may be considered for this work. Of course, he or she must have a workable knowledge of music and musical techniques. But the director of a junior choir does not need to be a skilled musician. The children and their Christian development are more important than a polished musical performance. This does not mean that shoddy and careless work is acceptable, however. Children are willing to work long enough on good music to know it well so that it can be performed with a high degree of proficiency. More will be said about this in a later paragraph.

Other qualifications for the leader should be patience (perhaps spelled in capital letters!), justice and a sense of humor. Also, he should be a fair disciplinarian. Children have respect for the teacher or leader who justly expects them to behave themselves and to maintain good order and work habits during rehearsal periods. This does not bar out a good laugh occasionally. The choir experience must be a "good time" for children and leader alike. Ruth K. Jacobs in writing on children's choirs says, "The choir should be an adventure in musical development, in co-operation, in character growth and in worship. It is the director's responsibility to make it so."

Just as important as the leader is a capable accompanist who knows and understands and loves children. The accompanist must be able to sight-read, although there should be little necessity of this if the leader plans the rehearsal periods well in advance. The instrumentalist must be an accompanist and not a soloist when playing for a junior choir. Children's voices are light and they should be encouraged to sing with light and sweet tones. This excellent tone quality can be enriched or destroyed by the way in which the accompaniment is played.

During the rehearsal periods several methods of teaching will be used. Some songs will be taught by rote. The leader will sing the song in its entirety and then the children will sing it either in part or whole as they hear it repeated. Even when books or words are used, the rote method is needed and used for smoothing up tricky or difficult spots in the music.

It is well for the children to have a copy of the words of a song, for the eye image helps to convey the meaning of the words to the performer. Words can be duplicated by mimeograph or other means for the children. Throughout a choir season, the repertoire of songs can be preserved in a notebook of some sort. A simple way is to staple the song sheets in a portion of a file folder cut to fit. Many children like to take their books home to study between rehearsals.

For best results, all junior choir music should be memorized. Children memorize readily and the process increases their understanding of the words. This enables them to enunciate clearly their words as they sing, so the listening audience receives the message of the songs. When children sing by memory, their heads are up and the music flows much more richly.

Each local group will need to consider the time for the rehearsal period. In rural areas this practice period may need to come on a Saturday afternoon or on Sunday preceding the Sunday-school hour or the Sunday evening service. In town or city churches, if the membership is not too far scattered, children could meet after school or at an early evening hour. No matter when the practice period is set, it should begin promptly and end as scheduled, for this helps to build up regularity of attendance habits. The co-operation of parents must be solicited in the process of developing this responsibility on the part of the children.

The songs sung in the early moments of the rehearsal period should be ones the children like especially. This begins the session with enjoyment and also motivates members not to be tardy. A rehearsal period of thirty to forty-five minutes is long enough if the children are in the lower six grades. About two thirds of the time should be devoted to drill work on new songs or ones that are to be performed soon. The closing ten minutes can be devoted to reviewing or singing the best-loved choir numbers. Perhaps a "theme" song could be adopted for the final number of each rehearsal such as "Lord, I Want to Be a Christian." This ends the period with a high moment of inspiration. Children respond to the challenge of such a hymn.

Music for the Junior Choir

Up to this point, nothing has been said about choice of music. Music within the range of the children's voices and within their understanding must be selected. Much unison singing should be done. This provides the opportunity of developing a good tonal unity in the group. Tone quality and phrasing can be improved through unison singing.

The following books are excellent sources for songs and hymns suitable for a junior choir: Hymns for Junior Worship ($1.25), Hymns for Primary Worship ($1.25), The Whole World Singing ($1.50, paper), The Brethren Hymnal ($1.75). (See Index of Topics in the 1951 Brethren Hymnal, pages 692-702, for hymns suggested for junior age groups.)

Choirs that have had some experience will wish to sing in parts. Well-chosen hymns or a simple canon (e.g., the Tallis Canon using the words of the Doxology) make a good beginning in two-part singing. Teaching of a descant to a familiar hymn can also be used as an introduction to part-singing. If there are older children who can really stay on an alto part independently, the Anthems for the Junior Choir series by Westminster Press, Volumes 1, 2 and 3 (90c each), provide beautiful two-part music. Another collection which is quite good is Your Children's Choir, by Flammer (40c). All of these books may be ordered from the Brethren Publishing House, Elgin, Ill.

How often should the junior choir sing? This will vary according to the local situation. Some churches use the junior choir every Sunday in some small way in their worship service. Other churches plan to use the junior choir once every month or two. Some choirs function just at special seasons or for special occasions. Where there are several choirs in the congregation, they can jointly give a special program at Christmas or Easter. No matter how often or how few times the junior choir sings, every time should demand their best. The leader and minister must help them feel their responsibility in guiding the congregation in a period of worship.

One junior choir gives a Sunday evening program at the close of the choir season. To plan and perform a forty-five minutes' to an hour's program by memory is a stimulating challenge to the children. They work hard on this program, for they have a significant motivation. Incidentally, this sort of achievement is a revelation to parents and others of what young children are capable of doing. Children can truly lead a congregation in a worship experience.

Some churches provide choir robes for the choirs. Where this is practiced, a few mothers should be asked to assume the responsibility of seeing that robes and ties are always in order and should assist the children in robing each time they sing. If robes are not furnished, a junior choir can appear in somewhat of a uniform dress if the girls wear white blouses and dark skirts and the boys white shirts and dark trousers. Simple ties can be provided to add to the uniformity.

"The church that provides a place in its worship for the junior choir is contributing in a significant way to the religious growth of both children and adults" (Margaret L. Crain in Music for Children in the Church School).

Understanding Our Motives

Joseph J. Schechter, M. D.
Anklesvar, India

THIS has nothing to do with your business here today, but why are you in India?" the police inspector said to me from across the desk. This was a fairly reasonable question to ask of me, but somehow I usually think that people should know automatically why we are here in India. "I am here because the Christ that I follow has said that we are to love our neighbors as ourselves, so if I love God then I must love my fellow human beings."

And then I went on to explain that this kind of love is different. It is a concern, an interest, a love that stoops to share in and lighten the pain and misery of the world. For if I am a true Christian I should not be content to live and let live. It is a kind of love that should make Christians different from other people. That is why we cannot be complacent about poverty, disease and sin.

"What kind of an agreement do you have with the organization that sends you?" was his next question. "How many converts do you have to turn in every year?" When I told him that there was no quota and that I would not be forced to return home if I failed to turn in any converts, he was, believe it or not, amazed. "You mean that you are just here to help us?" "That is exactly right," I said. "If you came to me in need of medical attention I would help you with no questions asked." "That is very commendable," he said, "but what do you say about a religion that lets a country hold another country in bondage for over a hundred years or goes to war and prepares for still another war?"

"I'll not attempt to alibi for Christians," I said. "I'm afraid that too many of us fail to understand our Christ. I fear that Christians have failed, not Christ, because they have not fully understood him. Just as you did not understand why I came to India, so I imagine you would like me to use a little understanding when looking at the record of the terrible massacres following the partition of India and Pakistan. At that time over 500,000 men and women met their death—more than twice the fatal casualties suffered by the British Commonwealth in the six years of World War II. Certainly this does not represent the best that Islam and Hinduism have to offer!'

His next and last question was, "Where in the Bible would you suggest I read to understand best the Christian religion?" I suggested he start with the fifth and sixth chapters of Matthew. What would you have suggested?

Understanding, according to Webster, is the power to understand, capability of comprehending and judging, etc. It is certainly something which all of us need. Families, races, churches and nations benefit from its power. How well did I understand this police inspector's need? How well do I understand the need of the people around me? I come in contact with people every day and it is so easy to fulfill some physical need, but fulfilling a person's total need is a little more subtle than a bandage applied, a medicine or a meal given. Do I really understand their need?

For that matter do I really understand Christ and his call? Christ has a need and that need is us. Christ has no hands but our hands

What motives send American Christians to serve in India? That is what the police inspector of an Indian village wanted to know to do his work today. We are the nail prints on his hands. If we abide in Christ, people on seeing Christ in us will believe on him, just as Thomas did on seeing the nail prints on Christ's hands. He received the ultimate in understanding and that was a faith by which we live. We pray that day by day our understanding may increase.

Meet Your Missionary

Mary Louise Swank

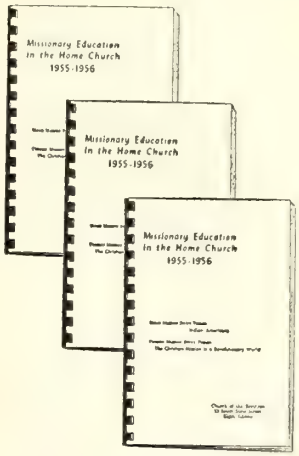
Norma Zimmerman

ON JUNE 21, 1930, Mary Louise was born to Emanuel and Rose Gorden at La Porte, Ind. She was the second child in a family of three, all of whom were girls.

Mary Louise has often related the many experiences that she enjoyed with her parents. Some of the happiest were in the springtime when the family would go for long hikes in the woods. Experiences of this type and others gave her a Christian character at an early age.

Because her mother worked away from home, Mary Louise learned early in life how to take care of herself. Family co-operation within the home instilled within her a sense of brotherliness and love.

At the age of eleven, Mary Louise was baptized and taken into the Church of the Brethren at Michigan City, Ind. She had a deep interest in the youth fellowship of the church and played the piano and served as chorister when the young people met together.



When Mary Louise was thirteen years old, Anna Warstler, a missionary to India, was a guest speaker at the Michigan City church. It was through this acquaintance with Anna Warstler and many discussions concerning service on foreign fields that Mary Louise first became influenced in the direction of missions. However, she felt that she could not go alone and so she hoped that she might meet someone who had the same interest in mission work as she.

During her high school years Mary Louise was quite active in the young people's organization of the church. She served on the Northern Indiana CBYF cabinet for a period of four years. It was at one of these meetings that she first met Robert Swank. Upon graduation from high school Mary Louise enrolled at Manchester College. During her freshman year Mary Louise and Robert decided to unite their lives and serve the Lord together. They were married on July 3, 1949. In the fall of 1949 they returned to Manchester College to continue their studies, Robert as a senior and Mary Louise as a sophomore.

Upon her husband's graduation they enrolled at Bethany Biblical Seminary. While Mary Louise worked for Sears Roebuck and Company she continued her studies at Bethany and through a correspondence course from Manchester College. In May 1955, seven years after entering Manchester, she graduated with a B. S. degree in elementary education.

In 1951 Mary Louise accompanied her husband to the Church of the Brethren in Blissville, Ind. It was here that she taught in the public schools, first a year at Hamlet, and then at Tyner, Ind. Then once again in the fall of 1954 she accompanied her husband to Bethany Biblical Seminary. In Chicago she accepted a teaching position in one of the suburban communities.

On Aug. 18, when Mary Louise set sail with her husband, one of her prayers was answered. The new prayer that she breathes within her heart is that she might serve God well as she ministers to her brothers and sisters in Nigeria, West Africa.

A Church Begins in Tucson

W. Arthur Cable

THE first public assemblage of Church of the Brethren people living in Tucson was held on Sunday, June 12, 1955, when a pot-luck dinner and devotional service were held in DeAnza Park in Tucson. Eighteen Tucson Brethren and friends were hosts to twenty-one Brethren from up-state: from the Phoenix, the new Lynnhaven and the Glendale congregations.

The large delegation from central Arizona was greatly appreciated, and its spirit of interest and encouragement was highly prized by the Tucsonans. The spirit that prompted the long drive—approximately 220 miles round trip—will be remembered with a warmness in our hearts. The meeting was spoken of that day and is remembered as a historic occasion.

Recognizing the basic importance of knowing faces and names and of promoting acquaintances and friendships, every person present was introduced to the group and a little background told of each one.

A Historical Sketch

On Nov. 24, 1954, in the first mail communication the writer ever received from Bro. Harold E. Wagner, he told about the establishment of the Arizona Church of the Brethren Missionary Association, asked about how many members lived in Tucson, how many would be interested in the establishment of a church in Tucson and asked the writer's thought on the matter.

As a result, on the evening of Feb. 21, 1955, fourteen Tucson members and active friends of the church—six men and eight women—met at the home of the writer and Mrs. Cable. The meeting was called at Bro. Wagner's suggestion; he and his wife were present and he presided over the informal meeting.

He described in detail the conception and development of the Lynnhaven Community Church of the Brethren in northwest Phoenix, explained that it had been established as a community church for long-range financial reasons, and talked on the central responsibility of Christian living: that is, to interest others in the saving gospel. When he asked, "How many are in favor of a Church of the Brethren being established in Tucson?" fourteen hands were raised. He then appointed the writer as chairman of the local survey committee, with instructions to form his own committee. The chairman called for volunteers and, before the meeting closed, seven persons—four men and three women—had volunteered to serve on it. One man and four women have since been added and one man has died, leaving a total present committee membership of twelve persons.

In March the committee submitted a budget request to the Ministry and Home Mission Commission of the General Brotherhood Board for the year beginning Sept. 1, 1955, that included a full-time pastor. The commission replied that, though it was in sympathy with the Tucson movement, it was unable to grant any funds to this mission point for the ensuing year. The funds of the district of Southern California and Arizona are also completely involved in other projects for perhaps the next year and a half. But Brotherhood officers, the regional secretary, and district officers have expressed their interest in the undertaking and have been helpful with suggestions.

The First Brethren Church of Tucson (Progressive Brethren) was organized in 1950 under the pastorate of the Rev. Vernon D. Grisso, formerly of Indiana and Ohio. On Dec. 3 Rex. Grisso was informed of the probable movement to establish a Church of the Brethren in Tucson; before the initial meeting of Tucson members on Feb. 21 it was made known to him; and he has been kept abreast of developments since that time. When the local committee's request for funds for 1955-56 was not met, Rev. Grisso, after talking with his official board, offered us in writing "the facilities of our church building for any periodic meetings, monthly or otherwise, in order to keep up your Church of the Brethren denominational and local interest. In case you have denominational leaders, missionaries, etc., coming through Tucson, we invite you to inform us and make free use of our facilities, that we may both enjoy them, until such time as you might have an edequate plant of your own." In addition he renewed his warm offer of a continued welcome and fellowship in all of the program and services of their church. This brotherly offer was received with deep appreciation.

The State Missionary Association approved the launching of the Tucson mission project. It is the established policy of the Tucson committee that, at least for the present, every Tucson person who is interested in doing so should become a member of this committee. Its membership therefore continues in a fluid, dynamic state. The president of the State Missionary Association in June labeled it the Tucson administrative committee. At its first meeting Mrs. Kennie (Leah) Williamson was elected secretary. On June 26 Bro. Wagner authorized the Tucson group to operate as a local congregation in all respects, including the election of a treasurer and the receiving of church letters. On July 2 Mr. Emory L. Grady, a local attorney and mortgage broker, accepted the treasurership. Besides these three officials the remaining committee members now are: Mrs. W .A. Cable, Mrs. Irene Cripe, Mrs. Alta Denniston, Mrs. Earl W. Ferguson, Mr. and Mrs. Raymond B. Huffman, Mrs. Delta M. Whitehead, Mr. Kenneth Williamson, Mr. Duane Wyles. For the summer the committee met once a month.

Mr. Charles Clifford Gephart, from the Eversole congregation west of Dayton, Ohio, though an invalid, was an active member of the committee until his death on June 8 and never missed a committee meeting except when he was in the hospital.

Tucson is one of the most rapidly growing cities in the United States. The Tucson urban area extends about fifteen miles north and south and ten miles east and west. Now with an urban population of 185,000 souls, it has been adding about 11,000 a year for the past five years. Its population figure for 1950 was 122,-764; for 1940, 58,072; for 1930, 42,971. These figures include permanent residents only. Seasonal residents were estimated in 1950 by the U.S. Bureau of the Census to total 10,000 within the city limits alone.

The Tucson members solicit the interest and request the prayers of Brethren everywhere for the success of the Tucson mission project. They want very much to have a church home of their own denomination where the ties are enduring and the bonds are eternal. It is hoped that every member will put first in his or her daily life the bringing of friends to the church through the spirit, "It means much to me; it can mean as much to you, and enrich you greatly."

Editor's note: On Sept. 22 Brethren Stanley Keller, J. W. Lear and E. K. Beekley of the Southern District of California and Arizona went to Tucson to study the possibilities of opening work there and the possible location of sites. From there they went to Yuma, Ariz., to study the developments there.

Better Leaders for Your Church

by Weldon Crossland

As the title suggests this book is about the leadership in your church:

How to find them . . . How to train them . . . How to keep them

The Basic Principles at the opening of each chapter state the fundamental leadership philosophy of the discussion, while the material which follows gives successful techniques and practical plans. Discussion questions are helpful in the application of the principles and plans to local situations. This is an important book for pastors, church school superintendents and members of personnel and nominating committees. Libraries should buy it. 128 pages Cloth $2.00

A Planned Program for the Church Year

also by Weldon Crossland

Church libraries should have this book available for the use of those responsible for planning the program of the church. The methods and procedures outlined have been actually tried and tested in churches ranging in membership from sixty to three thousand. Churches in rural areas, small towns and large cities have benefitted from the study and use of this inexpensive volume. 168 pages Cloth $2.00

Three Lions

The Reformation Witness

THE ALTAR and pulpit cannot always be permanent. Because of violent opposition to their faith these French Protestants, known as Huguenots, were forced to meet for worship in wooded seclusion around an altar that could quickly be dismounted in case of a raid. Yet in spite of, or perhaps because of, such persecution their faith was contagious and their loyalty to God's word was unquestioned. They had much in common with the earliest Christians who gathered just as informally to hear Peter or Paul. When the Huguenots came to the American colonies, seeking freedom of worship, they should have understood why still other "protestants," like the early Brethren, started their new churches in the wilderness.

Reformation Sunday calls to mind the heroic witness of Christians who sought the freedom with which Christ makes us free. No authoritarian church organization, no iron-clad dogmatism, no official state religion dare come between a man and his God or interfere with the assembling of a believing fellowship for Christian worship. Altars and pulpits may need to be movable, but faith remains unshaken.

Some Vital Questions

The National Exchange Club's Fact Sheet discloses: One out of 50 American youths will be before juvenile courts this year, five boys to one girl. If juvenile crimes continue their rate of increase, 1960 will show a rise of 40%. The U.S. has 129 schools for convicted juveniles costing $45,000,000 a year. Last year juvenile delinquents under 21 accounted for arrests for larceny, 47%; for auto thefts, 68%; for rape, 35%. Out of more than two million crimes in the U.S. last year over half were committed by persons under 21.

According to the Christian Business Men's League Bulletin, a test group to determine source of juvenile delinquency disclosed that 50% had mothers with criminal history, 62% had fathers that drank to excess, 66% had families that did not care what the neighbors thought of them, 70% had families who never had any recreation as a group, 60% came from broken homes.

The National Voice reports that in the U.S. there is a major crime every fifteen and one-half seconds, a drunk arrest every eight seconds. Also the World Health Organization discloses that the U.S. has the highest per cent of alcoholics of any nation, 3,952 per 100,000 (nearly 4%). France has 2,500. Marshal Petain said, "France lost the war because she had a drunken army."

Who is to blame: the home, the school, the church, the press, or politics? Or is each equally guilty? Some will say it is the movies, radio, television, comics. Do all contribute to some extent?

Does trying to "keep up with the Joneses" come in for a share? How about being afraid to be different? How about dress, or rather the undress? Does Rom. 14: 21 apply here? Do dad's bragging, "I got by on that deal," and mother's scanning fashion sheets and bridge guides, instead of the Decalogue and the Epistles, put the right attitudes in the child's mind?

How about keeping the Bible out of our schools? And do all professing Christians keep their lamps bright? Might there be some preachers "on the fence" instead of "on the firing line" against sin and doubtful practices?

Have we been "letting George do it" far too long? If we really want higher moral standards every true American must shoulder some of the responsibility and do something about it. Do some real thinking and observing, then do something about it. You may be the one to find a solution and the way back to safe and sane living, back to God and knowing and observing his unchangeable laws. — Mrs. H. Horner, East Canton, Ohio.

Make Parents Responsible

For many months I have been studying juvenile problems and have consulted with persons who understand the subject—ministers, judges, social workers. I have had correspondence with J. Edgar Hoover and William P. Rogers, deputy U. S. Attorney General. I am trying to do all in my power through the Lord our God to institute remedial measure and I beg of you to do likewise before it becomes too late.

It is estimated that ninety per cent of juvenile delinquency can be traced to the home. You say this can't happen to your children because you have brought them up in a Christian way and they know how to pray and they attend church and Sunday school regularly. But it might happen if your children should be exposed to those less fortunate youngsters who have not had the opportunity to get religious training.

We can pray for juvenile delinquents, as I do, for the less fortunate youngsters and for the parents whose children are or are about to be listed on juvenile police records. But I am asking you now as a safeguard for your own children as well as for others to do more than pray. I appeal to you to write your congressman and ask him to support or enact legislation that will make the parents of delinquent children responsible for the acts of their children. Only if this is done can our courts bring before them the responsible parents so they might share the penalty with their child. This is only just because in too many cases the juvenile's trouble is directly the fault of the parents.

So don't wait for someone else to act. Inform your congressman now. He may be waiting for you to express your sentiments. Your minister may write a petition to be signed by the church membership.—Murl Shoemaker, North Liberty, Ind.

Heritage of the Reformation

"Seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith . . ." (Heb. 12:1)

James A. Pike

THE Reformation, which is commemorated this week, was not the occasion of the invention of a new religion. It was a time when, by the leading of the Holy Ghost, prophetic voices underlined for their time great original Christian convictions which are the well-spring of our Christian life. We can never hear these convictions repeated often enough. They are good news for men of our age no less than they have been for the men of every age, and it is for the proclamation of this good news—and for the living of it together—that the church exists, today as of yore.

They say that most public speeches consist of "viewing with alarm" and "pointing with pride." And it so happens that these are two ways of making evident the power of the gospel. We can show what is wrong with man and with society in general, when it does not have the gospel. Since there is plenty that is wrong with us and with our common life and because we have not put first things first, this approach is a valid one and a true one. But in our quite proper concern for what is wrong we sometimes forget how much is right, how much of order and decency and love is constantly being displayed in our common life. And the recognition of this is also an avenue to understanding the gospel. And this is the approach I wish to use in this brief message.

Let us count our blessings. Most of us are living our lives in peace and freedom, enjoying the fruits of our endeavors, sustained by a variety of voluntary associations with one another which provide livelihood, recreation, health. Not only is the ordinary course of wholesome living made possible, but the emergencies of life are generally met—again through voluntary agencies of our making. We all too readily take these things for granted: we overlook the glory and wonder of the day-to-day plain goodness shown in individual lives, in family life, in our community life.

It has often been pointed out that this sort of thing is not news: if a man leaves his wife and runs off with someone else, it is news but when a man night after night returns from his day's labor to his home and family, it is not news. When a man is attacked on the street by a thug, it is news but the much more common experience, that we walk the streets in assurance and safety, often without a policeman in sight, is not news. And yet, taking history as a whole and the world as a whole today, these good things are news. Generally men have had freedom or order, but not both in abundance. Our having them both is no accident. What has enabled our people, by and large, to live co-operatively together with a minimum of force from above? Ethics, some will say. Surely, but I ask this question, Where do the ethics come from and why have so many wanted to keep the ethics? It is something deeper than ethics; it is nothing else than "the faith once for all delivered to the saints."

Most important are three of these convictions:

First, God has made us in his own image as co-sharers in his creative, ordering work. And thus he expects great things of us. The fact of his judgment of us—strange as it may sound to say so—is part of the good news. That God judges us means we are important to him; we matter in the eternal scheme of things. This is the basis of human dignity and the wellspring of integrity. When there is a policeman in every heart, we do not need one on every block. There are only two ways to keep many people working together—either they are whipped together from the outside or they are held together from the inside. The latter has been our way. I believe it was William Penn, who commented, "To avoid tyrants, obey God." Of the Puritan forefathers it has been said, "They feared God so much, they feared nothing else."

Especially did the Reformation highlight a man's direct responsibility to God for the conduct of his life—a theme our Bibles stress over and over again.

Second, God not only judges us; he redeems and heals us. He accepts us when we are unacceptable; he meets us as we are. In his Son Jesus Christ he has entered our estate, shared our hurts for our salvation. And men's grateful response ever since has been to do this very thing for others. This is why with the Christian era came concern for the outcast, the sick and the weak, the wrong and wronged of the world. All our social service institutions rest historically and logically on this concern of which God himself is the Author, this concern which he has revealed in Jesus.

Especially did the Reformation highlight the fact that man's standing with God is God's gift, not man's earning, and emphasize what has always been the dynamic of Christian ethics: we should be good to one another because God is so good to us.

Third, God wants us to work out our salvation together. It is he who has set us in families and communities, and our growth in interrelatedness, our involvement with one another, is part of the grand purpose of creation. Not isolated, self-sufficient "rugged individualists," but mutually dependent men, each contributing according to his gifts, are the fulfillment of God's purpose. He is known as Holy Spirit—holy "esprit de corps" if you wish—speaking and working though the fellowship of men. So all that interlaces our lives for good is of God.

Especially did our reforming fathers stress the corporate responsibility of men for their common life and assure us of the inspiration of the Holy Spirit in the work of the fellowship.

In short, the blessings of sound community life rest on a view of what man is meant to be which in turn rests on what God is and does. He is Creator and Judge; as made in his image we are meant—without force, but freely—to rise to the dignity of

A Life of Solemn Choosing

Glen Weimer

GOD MADE MAN for responsible life.

God gave man capacities for infinite good.

As a log can be transformed into winter warmth, so life can become the love of God in the flesh.

As a pond that ever receives water and never gives any becomes stagnant and the womb of decay—so life living for itself alone rots away in disintegration and futility.

God made man free—free to choose—free to become—free to add to the glory or the debauchery of life.

Life is an entrustment from God—you yourself are the greatest treasure you shall ever know or have to use. What you do with the marvelous and precious powers of body, mind, and spirit will mean endless happiness or pain. To go forward into life is to move upward on the trail of Christ.

Life can be built around getting for ourselves or giving ourselves for the blessing of the world.

Christ chose to give good to the very end of giving and living.

God calls us to a life of solemn choosing.

As we choose we forge our chains of enslavement or blaze the trail of life's ongoing freedom.

O Master, thou freeman of God, so lead us to abandon ourselves utterly to the love of God, that we may know thy freedom, peace and poise. Amen.

Reverence Within

ACCORDING to the Roman Catholic bishop who is in charge of St. Patrick's cathedral in New York, women who attend services there may wear "a soft veil" in place of a hat, but he objects to the use of napkins, gloves and other improvised coverings. The bishop says, "Just as one dresses properly to visit socially, all the more should one be properly attired for a visit to church."

We know that there are many different viewpoints as to the proper attire for worship and we respect those who are sincere in their convictions. One does not have to be an extreme conservative on the dress question, however, to wish that Brethren, who once were strict and perhaps legalistic about such matters, would not go to the other extreme and become utterly indifferent. The point to remember is not the force of custom but the importance of reverence in worship. While we prefer to see women with their heads covered in church, we doubt if some of the outlandish hats seen on Sunday morning could help anyone worship. At the same time we question whether the buzzing of whispering under properly veiled heads is conducive to prayer. Whatever the attire, it ought to be in keeping with a worshipful spirit. And certainly God, who looks not on the outward appearance but on the heart, is eager that our reverence come from within.—K.M.

Halfway House

SOME grandmothers have little to do but sit around finding fault with the younger generation. But others, like Mrs. Warren Douglas of Chicago, find ways of helping young people, especially those who may be in trouble.

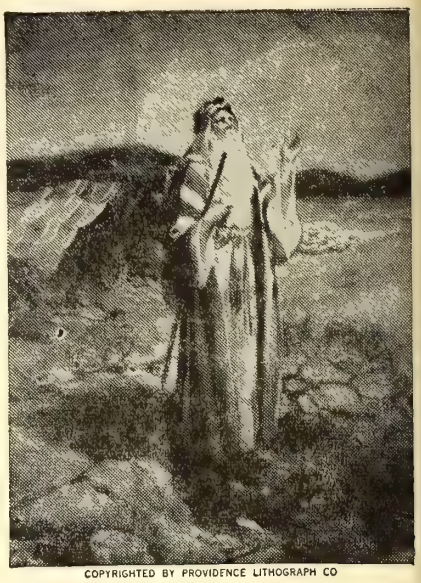
Mrs. Douglas has asked her friends to join her in building a home for girls "who have shown a tendency to get off on the wrong foot." She visited a training school for girls and learned that many who were described as "not quite bad and not quite good—about halfway" were assigned to such institutions because there was no other place for them. They still needed a home environment and the attention of people who cared about them. So Mrs. Douglas and her friends are planning a Halfway House, where they can at least meet such girls halfway.

Of course, it is obvious that even a Halfway House may need to go more than halfway. So far as dealing with halfway people is concerned, our churches ought to qualify because they find most members in such a half-good, half-bad condition. But while the church must be willing to meet them there, it dare not stop with halfway measures. It is a fellowship of believers in One who went the whole way—even to the cross. It calls us to a discipleship that requires us, after putting our hands to the plow, to go the whole way with our Lord. We dare not go only halfway with our gifts or our loyalties. We cannot "seek first his kingdom" in halfway measures.

Even in its efforts to reclaim the wrecked lives of those who have lost their way, the church must be more than a halfway house, though some have yet to go that far. Let's build a church that goes all the way with its message of salvation in a Lord who went all the way for us.—K.M.

Liquor on Passenger Planes

THE airline pilots and stewardesses have spoken out against the growing practice of serving liquor on passenger planes. Their associations have called on the Civil Aeronautics Board to forbid the serving of liquor because they regard it as a threat to safety.



Years ago when there were not nearly so many flights, a passenger could not board a plane if he was under the influence of liquor. Now the airlines have gone so far as to advertise their "champagne flights" and to picture their "cocktail hour" in the air. On some flights the alcoholic beverage is served without charge. Airline stewardesses do not like to serve as barmaids. Neither do they or the pilots want the responsibility of handling intoxicated passengers. Yet so far their protests have gone unheeded.

Not all major airlines follow the trend. Those serving alcoholic beverages are American, Eastern, National, Northwest Orient, Trans World, United and Western. Major airlines that have refused to serve liquor are Delta, Capital, Braniff, Southern, Piedmont and Allegheny.

Since the excuse for serving liquor is that "customers want it," those passengers who not only do not want it but also recognize it as a threat to safety, must speak up. They can choose a nonliquor-serving airline whenever possible. They can express their concern to the airlines that do serve liquor. The Civil Aeronautics Board in Washington, D. C., should know how Christians feel. And if the CAB and the airlines themselves fail to heed the requests of their own employees, all of us should support Representative Thomas J. Lane of Massachusetts in seeking a federal ban on serving liquor in the air.—K.M.

God Does Not Let Go

Inez Long

God would not let Abraham go until he had left Ur and gone to the Judean hills

COPYRIGHTED BY PROVIDENCE LITHOGRAPH CO

GOD DID not let go of that long procession circling the centuries of history:
A procession that breathed its first breath in Genesis;
that murmured and marched through the Exodus;
that shuddered at the sharp steel of the Prophets.

Out of that procession we have come;
Into that procession we belong if we,
like this slender segment like a vein of iron in history, are dedicated to this destiny: the will of God for our lives.
If this our destiny, if this our dedication,
Then we, too, have felt the force of a God who does not let go.

God would not let Abraham go.
He would not let go until Abraham became a giant of faith, leaving the lush laden valley of the Tigris to father a nation of One God in the stern Judean hills.

"Get thee out, Abraham,
Get thee out from thy country and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will show thee;
and I will bless thee and make thy name great and thou shalt be a blessing."

God would not let Moses go.
He would not let Moses, trained to be a prince in Pharoah's court, forget the burdens on his people's backs, for he,
blood of their blood, felt the force of free men's faith, stirring them out of slavery to a land of milk and honey with God their one true God.

This God would not let Moses go.

God wooed and wrestled and won 'til Moses stood, a mighty mountain of moral law.

The tablets bear the record still:
"I am the Lord thy God which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage;
Thou shalt have no other gods before me;
Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image;
Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain;
Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy;
Honour thy father and thy mother;
Thou shalt not kill;
Thou shalt not commit adultery; thou shalt not steal;
Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor;
Thou shalt not covet."

God would not let David go, singing shepherd boy, stepping from the silent solitude of hills and skies to shining splendor, to palace, pride, power.
Such power o'erturned God's will, for David used it ill, but still, God would not let David go
'til mercy washed him clean.

And David bowed his kingly head and stripped his soul of royal robes:
"Create in me a clean heart, O God,
and put a new and right spirit within me.
Cast me not from thy presence and take not thy holy spirit from me.
Restore to me the joy of thy salvation and uphold me with a willing spirit."

And David, until death, knew that the Eternal God is our refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms.
It is the God who does not let go.

God would not let Job go,
Job, whose sufferings bowed him low to earth,
whose friends forsook, whose God seemed dead.
Yet Job had done no wrong to suffer thus and God would not let go 'til Job had pleaded his cause, maintained his innocence, and gave to men
a new concept of God and how God deals with men.
And Job rose up with mystery as the mark of mortal minds, but faith and hope the seal of stalwart souls.

God, who would not let his people go until they blessed mankind:
Abraham, Moses, David, Job—these and many more:

This God, who in sundry times and in diverse manners, spoke in times past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these latter days spoken unto us in his Son.
This Son of God, this Man of Nazareth, flung fresh flares to pierce the paltry passions of the past,
to penetrate the unprobed paths ahead.

"I came, not to destroy, but to fulfill.
And thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, soul, mind and strength, and thy neighbor as thyself.
In this is all the law and the prophets.
For a new commandment I give unto you:
That you love one another."
And after Jesus left the earth, his spirit spun like the sun when shafts of light break through to lead, to warm, to cleanse, to heal.
His words took wings and wound themselves 'round worlds where eager minds welcomed them to win new truth;
His living presence a circle of loving hearts in a golden chain around the feet of God.

This God does not let go,
'til doubts are wooed to win a new reality;
'til hate walks unashamed into the purifying presence of love;
'til failure looks up unfrightened into the face of forgiveness.

This God does not let go, even today, but lays on us, upon the church, with Jesus Christ the head, this destiny:
To touch the trembling time in which we live—though we are troubled too by human struggles—
Yet to touch the trembling time in which we live, with stalwart spiritual strength from the God who will not let us go.
For this God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.

TWO OR THREE TOGETHER

AND when they had sung a hymn, they went out to the Mount of Olives. So reads the record. It was the time of the passover feast, and in the upper room Jesus had broken the bread of holy communion and poured out the wine for his disciples. They had experienced fellowship with God and with one another. They had fortified themselves for the crisis which was about to break upon them with unleashed fury.

From the beginning of his public ministry, and probably long before, Jesus had been tempted to avert this crisis, to follow a course which would bring popularity and "increase his influence." So sharp was the contrast between his understanding of God's will and the religion of the ecclesiastical authorities that he could not escape their hostility unless he compromised in his words and deeds. Three times he had pointed out to his disciples the handwriting on the wall and warned them that they also would be hounded down. Now the moment of supreme testing had come, so they worshiped together.

Solitary worship is indispensable but it is not enough; fellowship in thought and prayer and action is required at the height of the storm. If our blessed Lord was in desperate need of fellowship, how much more, how infinitely beyond his need, is our own requirement of fellowship, with its fortification, when the gale hits us.

Imperative is it that we take time, plenty of time, for fellowship in the home, in the sanctuary, in the circle of the group. Fuller opportunity is provided God to sustain us when two or three of us are gathered together in Christ's name, in corporate seeking and striving and re-enforcing. Sometimes crises can be forseen and sometimes they hurl themselves upon us with sudden vehemence. Unbroken communion with God and sustained fellowship with loved ones and friends are the most precious of all divine gifts.

Alcohol and Our Highways

James Renz

ALCOHOL killed my child! No, he was not a drinker for he was only four years old." After a long pause, this mother carefully weighed her words and continued, "And it wasn't a drunk who did it. Rather it was a friend of ours who had had only a couple of cocktails and four beers in our home. We had gone for a ride. He was only showing us what a grand time we all could have and what a wonderful driver he was at seventy miles per hour when . . . . There is little else to say. We now know his slowed reaction time caused him to miss that curve—and I . . . I have no son!"

This is no isolated case even though it is an actual one. This bereaved mother speaks for thousands of homes in which highway accidents caused by alcoholic beverages have caused bereavement, sorrow and pain. Mothers, fathers and children in every state are affected each day by drink-caused accidents and concomitant results.

There is actually more danger of becoming a casualty because of a drinking driver than there was by being a member of the branches of our armed services in World War II. You may be saying, "Has that man gone off his rocker? That cannot be true. Just think for a moment and you will see such cannot be the case." But let's consider the facts carefully and then evaluate our conclusions.

Facts From Various Sources

The National Safety Council, outstanding for its reliability and noted for its concern to reduce the number of highway casualties, summarizes its findings. "When we consider that acute alcoholism is the cause of twenty-five to thirty-three per cent of [personal injury] automobile accidents, the size of the problem increased astoundingly." This is a conservative figure from authentic sources.

Between the years 1937 and 1949, surveys covering the counties in which St. Louis, Cleveland, Los Angeles and part of New York City are located reveal an average of fifty-one per cent of all persons in fatal accidents had been drinking. The percentages ranged from forty-six to sixty per cent. It is important to note a comparable stability for various years as well as the different communities studied.

Dr. Andrew C. Ivy of the University of Illinois has carefully examined these and many other related statistics relative to alcohol and accidents. His careful analysis has led to the conclusion that approximately forty per cent of highway traffic casualties (deaths and injuries) are attributable to beverage alcohol. Dr. Ivy says, "I should add that in my opinion this figure of forty per cent is the most scientifically objective item of data which we possess for estimating the number of motor vehicle casualties caused by beverage alcohol."

Translated Into Fact

Using the conservative figure of twenty-five per cent of auto accidents caused by drinking drivers, the total casualties from drink-caused accidents in the four years of World War II were 938,623. In these same four years, total casualties in our armed forces were 556,126. Thus, during the second world war years, and in spite of restricted driving owing to rationing of tires and gasoline, nearly twice as many casualties were attributed to alcohol as to the war.

Elgin Courier-News

Highway accidents caused by alcoholic beverages have brought sorrow and bereavement to mothers, fathers and children in many homes

Using the forty per cent ratio figure of accidents caused by drinking drivers, total auto casualties because of alcohol for the four years of World War II would be 1,501,796. This means that, during World War II, nearly three times as many were killed and injured in the United States because of beverage alcohol as were injured and killed in all of our armed services.

Now, let us look at one more set of figures. In the year of 1952, according to National Safety Council figures, motor vehicle casualties were as follows: deaths, 38,000; permanent impairment, 110,000; temporary total disability, 1,250,000; total auto casualties, 1,398,000.

Using 40% as the ratio of alcohol-caused accidents, casualties due to drinking drivers for 1952 were 559,200. Comparing this with the casualties among U. S. armed forces in World War II, you see we have more alcohol-caused auto casualties in one year than we had casualties in the armed forces during the second world war. And remember that this does not include home accidents, industrial accidents, crime and disability caused by alcohol.

In summing up the effect of the drinking driver on highway accidents, David Herrick, chief of the Iron Safety Patrol, said, "The drinking driver is a far worse menace than the drunken driver."

This leads us to observe that most highway accidents are not caused by the drunken driver. The real menace is the moderate drinker who has anesthetized his brain just enough to slow down his reaction time and at the same time released his inhibitions so he will take increased chances and drive faster under the illusion he still has complete control of his faculties. The drunken driver tends to drive at a reduced speed or, if drunk enough, to refrain from driving at all.

The complicating factor is not that each drinker is drinking more alcohol, but that we have more drivers who drink.

The liquor interests want more drinkers, more persons who will consume only moderate amounts of alcoholic beverages. The alcoholic is the worst advertisement for the alcoholic beverage industry. But in getting larger numbers of moderate drinkers, they create more persons who are traffic hazards or create a traffic menace.

Increased Insurance Premiums

Insurance companies base premiums on factors such as

ALCOHOL THE GREAT DECEIVER

Alcohol is the great deceiver. It produces in the drinker a false estimate of values. It leads him to fool himself.

Alcohol is commonly understood, referred to and considered as a stimulant, yet it is in no sense a stimulant, but rather is a depressant —an anesthetic.

Alcohol makes a person feel stimulated and he fancies himself to be more effective both intellectually and physically, but as a matter of fact scientifically and conclusively established his competency in mental and physical matters alike is definitely less.

Alcohol exalts the ego while the nerve centers which have to prove the exaltation are slowly put to sleep.

Alcohol gives one a feeling of self-assurance and social ease yet its effect is to remove all social graces and sense of propriety.

Alcohol causes man to imagine himself to be bright and witty whereas he is actually silly.

Alcohol causes man to think he is the best of company because his tongue is loosened, his inhibitions are reduced and because he speaks and acts with less restraint, yet he actually is a social nuisance and a boor.

Alcohol in its first effects makes a person feel intellectually keen whereas his thinking processes and ability to make value judgments and quick decisions have actually been seriously impaired.

Alcohol gives man a feeling of heightened perception and creative ability whereas his mental processes are immediately impaired and the reaction time of his unconscious or involuntary reflexes is lengthened five to ten per cent. (One drink makes a difference of fifteen feet in stopping a car going at the rate of thirty-five miles per hour.)

Alcohol gives a feeling of well being and courage to face danger but actually lessens one's ability to cope successfully with adversity.

Alcohol affords a sense of direction to a frustrated person who is undecided and torn between conflicting urges and emotions but the direction is achieved on a plane of lowered standards of morals, ethics and value judgments.

Alcohol is the only narcotic which can be taken in the form of a beverage. It numbs that portion of the brain which makes one conscious of proper and improper behavior. It appears to help people have a "gay" time when in reality it only permits them to act in a manner they would be ashamed to act if sober.

Alcohol in the beginning has an especial appeal or attraction to a person who feels frustrated, inadequate or unsure of himself, but in the end it robs him of all will power to control his drinking or to make any semblance of constructive adjustment to reality.

Alcohol is the only drug which can supply the two contradictory motives of exaltation and narcosis. The exaltation motive is an expression of the will to live, to create and to act, while the narcotic motive is an expression of fatigue, a longing to escape from life and an urge for rest. It can supply both motives in the life of an individual in the course of a few years.

Alcohol is a crutch for lame ducks! Alcohol is the great deceiver!

—By a former alcoholic cost of operation, promotion, claims and other items. The largest factor in determining the insurance premium you pay is the total volume of claims paid by the company. Thus, any company that can eliminate payment of claims for alcohol-caused accidents can write insurance at reduced rates.

Modern highways are built to facilitate the flow of traffic, to provide safety for those who use them, and to do such at a rate of speed commensurate with existing conditions. Cars have increased in size and lethal power, as well as in beauty and cost. In the hands of a person without complete control of mental facilities, a modern car becomes a lethal weapon. Alcohol is the trigger to death, destruction and sorrow.

Yes and I pay the bill. Every accident, every death and each injured person reflects in our lives as we pay the costs for insurance, for institutions to care for the maimed, for police, courts and jails to control the drinker and for other effects of alcohol-caused accidents.

I certainly do not sanction war and this article is not so intended. But let us do the following as Brethren: Use such facts as those cited herein to educate our churches and communities. Commit our lives to total abstinence from all alcoholic beverages. Prepare our children, youth and adults in church school, home, vacation church school, camp, college, seminary and other agencies to live the Christian life every day. Cooperate with other denominations and agencies in our communities to bring the total power of all groups to bear on the problem.

The mother referred to earlier is an outstanding teacher of junior-high youth. Alcohol killed her son. But it did not kill her spirit. The Holy Spirit in us will enable us to eliminate the spirits of this world. "Go ye therefore . . . and teach them to observe all things that I have taught you. . ."

creative responsibility. He is Redeemer and Healer; as made in his image we are meant to redeem and heal those in need around us. He is Inspirer and Ground of Community; as made in his image we are meant to be builders of a community among men.

So, Father, Son and Holy Spirit—one God—is the Source of our blessings of free, constructive ordered life in community. And this faith in what he is and does with us and through us is "the faith once for all delivered to the saints."

Now some of you are doubtless thinking at this point that there are many good men who do not hold this faith, many good men who do not go to church. That is right, there are. But these men are living off the income of a Christian endowment without contributing to the capital. They are good because their grandfathers feared God. And in many aspects of our society we are seeing the demonstration of Elton Trueblood's fine definition: Ethics is cut-flower religion. Cut-flowers look fine for a while, but when too long cut from their roots, they wither.

There was a time in recent decades when it looked as though these roots would die—from the inattention of men preoccupied with the cut flowers. But we can rejoice that it is now evident that the tide has turned. More men and women in this land are part of the Christian cause today than at any time in our history, and more than ever before gather together eagerly to hear the good news which is our health and the salvation of our common life. One of the signs of the times was the landmark statement of President Pusey of Harvard a couple of years ago repudiating the negative attitude of his predecessors toward supernatural religion and calling for "fresh and convincing . . . leadership in religious knowledge, and even more in religious experience," which he set above "industrial might" and "more research facilities" as the important thing for our time.

If the churches which share in the heritage of the Reformation are to take full advantage of this turning of the tide, it is not sufficient that they speak the gospel of judgment and grace to those outside; they must look at their own life and work critically and seek the grace of regeneration for the church itself. Such self-criticism and renewal should be the constant hallmark of any church which regards itself as "Protestant."

Martin Luther did a crucially important thing when he brought to the fore again the doctrine of justification by grace through faith which had become submerged by the medieval system of "merits": but even more basic than this was the fact that he transcended the situation that the church was in, looked critically at it and was a means of judgment upon it. Out of this more fundamental thing came the particular reforms; it, rather than any special doctrine, is "the Protestant principle," to use Paul Tillich's phrase.

Thus a church is not truly Protestant simply because it has had a reformation or arose out of the Reformation; a church is truly Protestant when it recognizes that it always needs reformation. To be Protestant is to see the church as under judgment and this means the church today as well as the church of the 16th century.

Thus the annual celebration of the Reformation should be an occasion not so much for rehearsing the failings of the pre-Reformation Western church, as for facing honestly the failings of our churches today. Especially is it important that we do so now, because with the renewed interest in religion today and the opportunity the Lord has given us to reap a great harvest for him, we need to be as sound and as effective as we can be.

So, as we open ourselves to God's judgment to purge the church and in His grace to renew its life, let us look confidently toward the future. As we do, let us remember in reverence and awe our forebears in the faith: the first Christians, who, with much less tangible evidence for it than we have, nevertheless had utter confidence in the power of the gospel; the reformers of all ages who in their times reaffirmed the gospel; and all the saints, known and unknown, who have lived it out.

The Family Counselor

Naomi Will H. K. Zeller, Jr. Jesse Ziegler

The Family Counselor welcomes letters of inquiry. They may be addressed: Family Life Department, General Brotherhood Board, 22 S. State St., Elgin, Ill.

Dear Family Counselor,

I am the wife of an alcoholic. Although he makes very good wages, my husband does not provide for our family of five children and myself. From time to time he comes home drunk, beats me up or runs out of the house with a gun or knife and usually spends just about all of his pay check for getting drunk.

The only people who have helped me are in the church. Some family in the church usually takes our family in when we are destitute and homeless. The church has been grand in providing groceries and clothing for us. But I don't like to feel I'm on charity.

Just what can I do to make my husband understand his responsibility to the church and our family? He doesn't like the church or those who go there, pleads for me not to divorce him and generally criticizes me for everything I do and says I do not keep house like I ought to. I'm just about ready to give up all hope.

Disgusted Wife.

Dear Friends,

Your dilemma is no easy one to solve, although there are certain helpful suggestions one can make. One must remember that the alcoholic and his family (either by virtue of the problems confronted in the situation or because of the problems that create the attempt to escape through drinking) are many times reacting as maladjusted persons. The alcoholic will act in an abnormal way and will be met with what seems to the individual to be normal reactions but which are really also abnormal. In other words, an alcoholic husband can create a mentally ill wife and family.

The first suggestion I would make is related to your role in the family. From your letter I gather you have threatened divorce many times. The pleading and promises of your husband have deterred you from carrying through with a divorce action at this time. There also seems to be some fluctuation at points in your life while there is firmness at others. You will need to think through and determine your plan of action and then firmly and with love carry it to conclusion.

Relative to your husband, I seriously doubt whether your present method of approach to the problem is helpful to him. Whether he does it consciously or unconsciously, his actions which drive you from the house provide him with an opportunity to use his money for alcoholic beverages. Once he has chased you to the church group and they have provided the clothing and groceries, he is free to use his pay check for drink. Thus the church is unwittingly continuing the process.

There are then positive suggestions which one can make. When your husband becomes violent, it is for the best interest of all concerned to have him put in jail. This will give him an opportunity to sober up. You, your minister and others can visit him there. Once he is completely sober, discuss frankly with him the whole problem. You will then have to decide what direction you will take in the matter. Your pastor can assist you in looking at the various solutions possible with you making the final decision.

Should your husband not desire any help, you cannot force it on him. I have the firm conviction it would then be best for you to decide to pull the crutches out from under him. That will bring him more quickly to the place of complete inability to deal with his problems. At the point where he says, "I'm licked. I need help," both you and the church must be ready to assist him.

This may mean separation of you and your family from him for the present. It will also mean the securing of an order for him to pay for the support of his family. Should he fail to provide the payments, firmness must again be applied.

Once you have pulled the crutches from under your husband, the church may need to assist you if you need much help. But this should be done only when your husband does not come through with support for the family.

In this whole process you will want to study thoroughly what, if any, part you have as the cause of your husband's problem and correct it. You need to be firm but loving in all your decisions. The only way to educate your husband to his responsibility is to drive him to the wall where he must face facts. In the whole process your love ought to overweigh any vindictiveness you may have.

There is then still the possibility that your husband may have consumed such excessive amounts of alcohol over long periods that he has done brain damage that cannot be repaired. If such is the case and he cannot be rehabilitated, you will need to seek ways to readjust your life and rear your family by yourself.

In summary, I would pointedly give the following statements: Carefully evaluate your part in the whole case. Check with competent persons, such as your minister, doctor, etc., your reactions and their relationship to your home problem. Decide on your plan of action in light of all the facts you can gather and be firm in your conviction. Pull the crutches from under your husband as soon as you can. Stand ready, with your church, to assist when the time comes for helping your husband. Work with faith that the answer to your problem can be found.—James Renz

Applying the Teachings of Jesus

AT THE beginning of the year, students of peace studies at Manchester College (both undergraduate and alumni) were invited to do some thinking with regard to the basic teachings of Jesus in the area of human relations and to participate by letter in the forum or symposium on the subject, turning their attention in particular to the question how they would apply the teachings of Jesus to problems of international relations today. The response to the invitation has been excellent. Letters have come from our recent alumni in many walks of life—some in graduate work, some in seminary, some teaching, some engaged in pastoral work, some occupied with homemaking. They have proved so interesting that we felt that we would like to share some of them with Gospel Messenger readers. From the replies which have been received, six extracts have been selected.—Gladdys E. Muir.

A Seminary (Vanderbilt) Student:

To make our foreign policy Christian (1) we will need to walk in Russian and Chinese moccasins for a mile and see our policies and behavior from their point of view. (2) We should work toward the reversal of the present budget ratio between military and economic aid, that is, the billions to economic aid and the millions to the military. We should bestow our aid with love and with no strings attached. (3) We should work through the United Nations, not pay it lip service. We should work for the self-determination of all nations even if it does tread on some toes. Right now we should work for the independence of Formosa. We should cease making arrogant demands on the United Nations' officials, for example, recent summons of Hammersjold by Dulles after his Peiping visit. We should cease the consideration of any unilateral military action of aggressive or punitive nature. We should forget the assumption that "free peoples" everywhere are eager for our "protection," unless they explicitly request such aid. We should give the United Nations deserved financial support.

There are hard areas which we must not sidestep. This requires doing what Jesus commanded, loving those who are unlovely such as enemies, barbarians, strangers and atheists. This seems to go against the grain of us fallen sinners! It requires a genuine conversion and a willingness to take Jesus seriously. Loving these people requires some sharing. Every member of the family is not always agreed on the extent to which the family can sacrifice. This requires more love and patience. This love must be intelligently implemented. Intelligent sharing is helping others to do for themselves what needs to be done. Loving people of other nations also means that we as a people who love our heritage of freedom should work for these same privileges for all people, even if the French, the British or our own United Fruit Company are going to be opposed.—Roy Valencourt.

A Medical Student:

The problem of applying Christian teachings in government and world affairs is tremendous. But the problems arising from the application of Jesus in our lives and in our day-to-day relationships is even more tremendous. We are prone to anger. We are prone to resisting evil by using the tools of evil. We are prone to suspicion of our fellow men. We are prone to worry about tomorrow. We are prone to suppress the good and emphasize the weakness in ourselves and our neighbors. And we take much thought for our lives.

If the basic teachings of Jesus were rightfully applied to our immediate human relationships, we would not have to be anxious about international relations or, more important, "our eternal relations." We must, like Jesus, be most concerned with the individual and in this great concern Jesus did achieve much in international and eternal affairs. We can do the same, for this Man gave us the power to achieve greater things than his achievements. The fruits of this enterprise would not be immediate, but everlasting.—Henry Eshelman, Indiana University.

A Schoolteacher:

It seems as though the psychological preparation for use of war as a policy is undermined by Jesus' teaching and example of accepting death rather than cause it for others, even in one's self-defense. We are prone to put too much value on this present life and too little on eternity. My brother-in-law gave me an idea which I would like to share. It may answer some who claim to be religious and interested in saving souls. If someone started to kill me and I managed to kill him first, I should thereby be responsible for sending his soul to hell, because he had no chance to repent of his sin (of trying to murder). On the other hand, if I remained innocent and were killed, I not only would go to heaven, but would be setting an example as to how to live and die. I quote this individual example even for international affairs, because almost invariably in a discussion of using peaceable methods, someone will say, "What would you do if . . .?" and give a case of conflict between two or three individuals.

There are some who would say I have been dealing with symptoms (war), that I would do away with the causes. I agree, except that the fact that we are willing to resort to war is, in itself, one cause of war. "It starts in the minds of men." —Arly Waggy, Goshen, Indiana.

A Seminary (Bethany) Student:

Jesus specifically refused the way of power and military might to throw off an unjust Roman tyranny. He considered this a temptation and overcame it. Loving God and our neighbors as ourselves, of course, often involves more than just doing the normal Christian duties we are committed to in our everyday living. If China is having famine, we must do, as we would have them do to us if we were in their position, even if we do not agree with their political ideas or even if we will strengthen their Communist government's position by helping the people in time of famine. Human suffering can never be looked upon as a political weapon and neither should our generosity be seen in terms of what it will get us. For Christians human values are always higher than material, prestige or power values. "If your enemy hungers, feed him!" That is plain Biblical teaching. And Christian love is often necessarily unilateral, done with no hope for recompense or appreciation or even co-operation on the part of those on the receiving end of our Christian giving.—Allan Deeter, Chicago, Illinois

Some sixty young people, mostly students, from many countries helped in the construction of a settlement house in Berlin for Hilfswerk, welfare agency of the Evangelical Church in Germany

A Graduate Student:

What can the Christian do?

(1) He must support those individual policies which seem to him clearly to represent a more Christian policy. In other words, we would support those who refuse to rearm. But we support policies, not systems. We must be aware that our reasons are different from those who analyze politically. We must be able always to part company with the ways of the "world." Furthermore, we must continually witness to the fact that our policy is based upon the gospel and not a particular secular position.

(2) Basically, then, the Christian has no international policy, no position to which he can confidently turn and say, "Here is our foreign policy, here is our economic conception, etc." The Christian can only back certain things at certain times. The question of how he makes a decision politically is relative; I can see two Christians sincerely voting on different sides of an issue because they sincerely believe that their position is best. Generally, however, the issues should be clearer than that.

(3) The Christian teaching is individual because any group or national statements could only be time-bound. This statement immediately has two exceptions: one, it also means the individual church rather than the individual person. Though I think the person is ultimately responsible, I do not see the person apart from the people of God. Individuals within the local church may disagree on various policies but should not disagree on "radical love." Secondly, I think individual policies must eventually build national policies. Hence, the radical relationship of Christians to one another in the first three centuries could dramatically affect the course of the Roman Empire.

(4) The very center of Christian ethics it seems to me is the Suffering Servant. Often we overlook the very power of this vicarious suffering. The Europeans are right in saying that peace is in the hands of God, but they forget that his power has historically shaken the world through the Suffering Servant, not only Christ but the many who followed after him. The Christian hope politically, then, is based upon his faith in God; his action politically upon the revelation of God. We must be ready to suffer for our belief, but we have every right to know that it conquers ultimately.—Graydon Snyder, University of Gottingen, Germany.

An Undergraduate Student:

As I see it the problem is not what Jesus' teachings were; they are in our New Testament to know and interpret. The problem is how to apply them to international problems. We can work at them in many different institutions. Through government one can work on the problem. We can influence our senators and representatives to vote according to the dictates of our Christian witness. We can work for tolerance in race, religion and creed (FEPC on a federal or state level helps in this). Also in the United Nations we can support and co-operate with the Committee on Human Rights. We can work for equitable wages and respect for humanity through our influence in labor unions. We can vote.

In all our problems, we can give of ourselves in service, preparing to use our talents to help others make life more worth living. The church can help alleviate the frustration of empty lives by showing the people in that condition a constructive way of living—how to find meaning in life and be at peace with one's self. It should exert active influence in policy-making organizations such as the legislative bodies of our country, too.

Service with the love motive in other countries is one of the most effective ways to bring about international understanding and peace. If one learns to know and serve men as brethren, he cannot kill them. He can think only of the best things in life for them.

Christ voluntarily gave his life for humanity. Can we do anything less?—Don Flory, Manchester College.

The Dawn

Clarellen Smith

MANY mornings I had watched the dawn bringing illumination for the day's living. It was like leaning one's arms upon the window sill of heaven for a brief glimpse of its beauty and light.

Another morning I stood at the same window waiting for a repeated experience. A cloud covered the sky. It was a smooth gray cloud. The wind whistled and rattled the dry leaves clinging to the wisteria vine hanging from the upper terrace.

I felt the chill of the scene. Dark thoughts came to entertain the waiting mind. I would have turned away, but something held me. I saw the smooth gray cloud break into many smaller clouds. All were moving in one direction. The speed with which the steady line moved, thrilled me. My mind enquired, "Whither bound?"

Then a magical thing occurred. The rim of every cloud became a line of gold. A rose color tinged the larger portion. All moved into the glory of the rising sun.

When "Commune" Is "Speak"

Luther A. Weigle

AS APPLIED to the interchange of thoughts and attitudes in conversation, the verb commune was a colorless term in the sixteenth century. But it now implies an interchange which has a measure of intimacy and a high level of artistic or spiritual content. We would no longer use the word commune to describe ordinary conversation or talk that is low or quarrelsome or malicious. The result of this change in English usage is that the Revised Standard Version of the Bible retains the word in only two out of the twenty-eight instances of its use by the King James Version.

For example, where the psalmist says of the wicked: "They encourage themselves in an evil matter; they commune of laying snares privily" (64:5), the present version reads:

"They hold fast to their evil purpose;
they talk of laying snares secretly."

When the scribes and Pharisees were angered by Jesus' attitude toward the sabbath (Luke 6:11), it is stated that "they were filled with madness, and communed with one another what they might do to Jesus." The Revised Standard Version has changed this to read: "They were filled with fury and discussed with one another what they might do to Jesus."

The account in the King James Version of Judas' bargain to betray Jesus reads (Luke 22:3-6): "Then entered Satan into Judas surnamed Iscariot, being of the number of the twelve. And he went his way, and communed with the chief priests and captains, how he might betray him unto them. And they were glad, and covenanted to give him money. And he promised, and sought opportunity to betray him unto them in the absence of the multitude." It is curious to note the high terms in which this treasonable transaction is described—Judas "communed" with the priests, they "covenanted" with him, he "promised" them. These are words of honor; they do not fit the scene. The Revised Standard Version is more faithful to the Greek, and better describes the situation, by using more objective terms—Judas "conferred" with the priests, they "engaged" to give him money, and he "agreed."

The two passages where the present version retains the word commune are Psa. 4:4 and 77:6, both of which are concerned with meditation.

Teach Your Wife to be a Widow. Donald I. Rogers. Holt and company, 1953. 96 pages. $2.00.

Money and business matters confronting a widow are the theme of this book. The thesis is that most widows are ill-prepared to take over the business administration of life and preparation should be made by husband and wife against the day she may be a widow.

Much wise counsel regarding wills is given. The holding of property jointly, the need of a will for the survivor, provision for minor heirs, employment of legal counsel, the administration and cost of probate and estate settlement are well discussed. He points out the popular idea that only the older and well-to-do people need wills. He says that many young families of moderate means need them even more. He stresses the need for wills by both husband and the wife.

The author lays great stress on teaching the wife to be capable of an investment program. He suggests she familiarize herself with stocks and bonds, follow the economic picture and be able to buy and sell securities as conditions would dictate.

This simply written book will alert husbands and wives to planning against the day when the wife may be a widow. It would be a good text for a discussion leader. We are disappointed that the author gives no suggestion that the Christian movement be considered in the distribution of assets.—H. Spenser Minnich.

The Rediscovery of the Bible. William Neil. Harpers, 1954. 255 pages. $3.00.

This is a fascinating, invaluable book about the Bible. The author, a distinguished Scottish Biblical scholar, has gathered up all the fruits of the past hundred years of Biblical study and presents them in clear and vivid form. Then he shows how all this study and discovery has caused the Bible to stand out in new splendor and unique practical relevance for modern life. He answers two questions: What is the net result of the long critical study of the Bible? What is the value of the Bible today?—Edward K. Ziegler, Roanoke, Va.

KINGDOM GLEANINGS

It has been called to the attention of the directors of the Flat Creek mission, Creekville, Ky., that certain members of the general church constituency receive letters soliciting material aid in the form of clothing, money, toys, etc. In a few instances these requests may be worthy, but generally the practice is nothing short of a racket. This area of Essie, Ky., from which most of the letters come, has no connection with the mission program at all. The director of the mission, Allen Weldy, is suggesting that those who receive such letters do not send the materials asked for but instead refer the letters to the Weldys, who will investigate and fill the needs that actually exist.

La Verne College

Enrollment figures for the present term show 268 full-time students and 85 part-time, a total of 353. This compares with 218 full-time and 86 part-time a year ago, a rise in full-time enrollment of more than 20 per cent. Among the new students are more than 90 freshmen, 25 more freshmen than ever before in the history of the college.

Among the students, too, is Gerda Hitzemann, German exchange student from Gottingen University. She is exchanging places with Shirley Ulrich, La Verne College student from Wenatchee, who is studying in Gottingen this year under an exchange arranged by the college and the La Verne Church of the Brethren women's work through the Brethren Service Commission.

the Federal Housing Authority. The architect's plans are now before the city and county building inspectors. It is expected that ground can be broken for the new building before Christmas.

New teachers in the faculty this year include John Skov, English and literature, who has a Master's and has done postgraduate study at the University of Southern California; and Ira Holland, who earned his doctorate at Columbia University. Dr. Holland is taking the courses in sociology during the leave of absence of Professor Melhorn.

Degrees were granted to thirteen students at the opening convocation and graduation exercises on Sept. 14. These were seniors who had completed their work during the summer session.

Contributions to the college from all sources and for all purposes during the fiscal year ending Aug. 31, 1955, total $81,012. Of this total, $46,420 came from churches of the region and members and groups within the churches. Among the gifts was $15,903 from foundations and $10,053 from the local community outside the church. Six thousand dollars of the total was in annuities.

The largest contribution to be received in the history of the college has just become known. It is the distribution of a trust fund of the late Samuel and Inez Hanawalt of La Verne which specifies that a fund of more than $100,000 will be given to the college to be used for scholarships. This will greatly enhance the college's scholarship program and indirectly aid the current operating budget.

Home-coming activities will be held on the week end of Nov. 11 and 12. Activities will include a dramatic presentation both Friday and Saturday evenings, a football game with Pomona-Claremont Saturday afternoon, and a basket dinner Saturday noon for alumni, parents and other college friends. High school juniors and seniors in the churches of our area will be guests of the college at these events.

We Met the German Exchange Students

Paul and Opal Wilkinson

HAVE you ever felt you were in a foreign land when you were in your own native country? That is how we felt when we met fourteen German exchange high school students at Union Station in Chicago in August of this year. We had been thinking and planning for several days beforehand on how we could best help them enjoy Chicago for the day they were to be there. We were to meet them at the train upon their arrival and take them to breakfast; their remaining time was to be spent sight-seeing in Chicago, if they wished, before they boarded their trains for their various destinations.

We arrived in Chicago half an hour before the students' train was due. We found an adequate place for breakfast and then hurried back to meet the train. When the train arrived we easily recognized the students.

Thinking back over the wonderful experience of the day we are convinced that a smile is the most effective way of winning friends and becoming acquainted. Most of the students had had six years of English language study before they came to America and they had quite large vocabularies, but trying to apply the right word at the right time occasionally became a problem. This was apparent especially as the students tried to decide from our American menus what they would order for breakfast. Some of the students wore very astonished expressions when they were served foods which they did not know they had ordered. Merlin Shull, who had been a Brethren Service worker in Austria, was a great help both to the students and to the waitresses. He served as a very able interpreter throughout the day.

Our friends decided around the breakfast table that they would like to go sight-seeing and after breakfast we started out on foot. As we walked along the streets one after another took out his camera to catch a picture of the tall buildings. The brilliant colors of the Chicago Board of Trade building with all of its American flags flying especially attracted their eyes and cameras.

Since the thermometer registered high, it was refreshing to sit for a time in the cool breeze near the shore of Lake Michigan while we watched the small boats come and go.

We were deeply gratified by the way people accepted the students everywhere we went. Many persons inquired as to when the students had arrived, how long they planned to stay and where they were going. One of the girls had beautiful blond braids which fell below her waist. Several people on the street came up to her and told her never to cut her hair.

One of the boys who was wearing *leder Hosen was recognized as being German and a number of people came to him and spoke to him in German. While we were waiting in the station one woman conversed at length with him in his native tongue. Soon after she left the students she returned with a bag of oranges and candy for the group. As she gave the boy the bag she remarked with a smile, "The way is long to California."

Such instances as these made us very much aware of the fact that the American people had forgotten the past and were living in the present. We realized even more deeply the value of the exchange program in advancing international understanding which is so essential to peacemaking.

As the time drew near for our German friends to depart—two for California, three for Iowa, one for Colorado, one for Nebraska, one for Idaho, two for Washington, four for various points in Illinois—we had a wonderful feeling that during the day we had been of help to them in learning and understanding more about our country. Our hearts were warm indeed as we said, "Auf Wiedersehen."

*Leder Hosen are short leather trousers frequently worn by young men in Germany.

Each year arrangements are made to have exchange students who are traveling west met between trains in Chicago. Paul and Opal Wilkinson, serving in B.V.S. at Elgin, and Merlin G. Shull, former Brethren Service Commission worker in Austria, were asked by the student exchange office to meet this year's group of students.

Report From Stroudsburg

Ivan Fry directed the B.V.S. unit which served the flood area in Stroudsburg, Pa. With W. Ray Kyle and Frances Clemens, he made an inspection trip to decide which area was in most need and what type of relief was in greatest demand.

THREE of us from the Brethren Service Center in New Windsor, Md., W. Ray Kyle, Frances Clemens and the writer met a member of the Pennsylvania Council of Churches executive staff in Harrisburg on Tuesday morning, Aug. 30, to inspect flood damage from Hurricane Diane in the Delaware River basin.

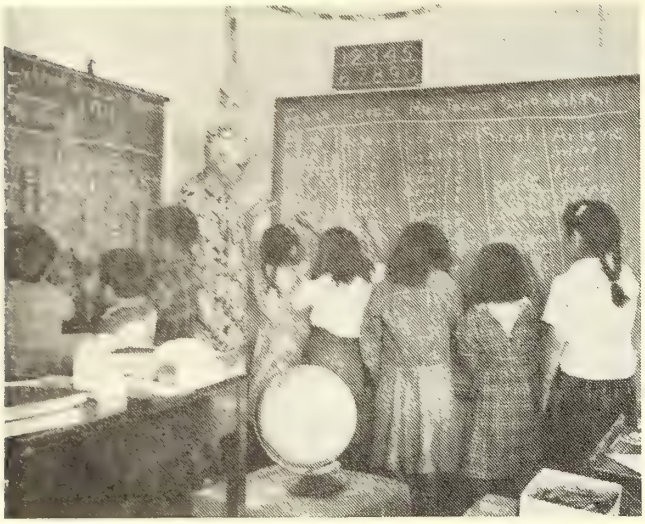
Stroudsburg and East Stroudsburg, Pa., seemed to be the most heavily damaged areas in the state. We made contact with the pastor of the Stroudsburg Methodist church, one of the disaster centers. This church had supplied sleeping accommodations in the church basement for from 80 to 120 persons since the night of the flood and had served more than a thousand meals either in the church or from canteens operating out of the church. The greatest need in the area was for workers to help clean up and repair damage left by the flood.

The best arrangement for supplying relief workers seemed to be to take the incoming B.V.S. training unit to Stroudsburg and to have their teachers for the week lead them in evening sessions there.

The training unit arrived in Stroudsburg in the afternoon of Sept. 2. We were given the first of a series of typhoid shots and heard a lecture on extra health precautions from the dispensary nurse at the church. The drinking water in Stroudsburg was contaminated and our water was brought in from out of town in two-quart milk containers. Milk companies in the area bottled enough water to supply 15,000 persons every day. We were not allowed even to brush our teeth with local tap water or to touch any food with our hands before we had washed them in distilled water. We handled all of our food with paper napkins or waxed paper; all of our eating utensils were disposable ones.

From the church, workers were operating a feeding station, distributing a variety of flood clean-up equipment, passing out relief clothing and handling a large quantity of used furniture and dishes for flood victims. Having all this going on in one church made it seem very much like a seven-ring circus at times.

The flood relief took place in several stages, and each stage had to follow the other logically. The first stage was finding shelter for the flood victims the night of the flood. The second stage was feeding them the next morning and the third was finding clothing for them instead of the night clothing which many of them were wearing when they left their homes. The fourth stage seemed to be the expansion of all these facilities and the fifth was the removal of the debris and the cleaning program.



The girls in the unit worked most of the time at washing down houses which had earlier been cleared of mud by crews of men. The high water mark on most of the houses was four to six feet up on the walls of the second story. During the first few days the fellows worked on a street which had not been touched before by any clean-up crew. They dug from six to ten inches of mud out of basements, occasionally working by flashlight because electric power was not available to any of the flood-damaged houses.

After the first four or five days most of the mud had been cleaned out of the basements of the homes; most of the debris had been cleaned out of the houses and yards and moved to the edges of the streets where it was picked up by bulldozers. Then the entire B.V.S. unit turned to washing down walls. The local fire company steamed the walls of the houses to sterilize them.

After we had finished digging the mud out of a basement and washing down and steaming the walls of a house, there were still weeks and even months of work left for the householder. He still had before him the repairing of damage to the house, the washing of all the dishes and furniture that survived the flood and the cleaning and repairing of his yard. When we say that the unit had finished, it does not mean that the job was done. It means that a stage in the clean-up had been reached where a large volume of help at one time could not be used.

On Sept. 10 the unit wound up its work in Stroudsburg and returned to New Windsor. Our unit had given approximately 325 man hours of labor to flood relief in Stroudsburg. The work in Stroudsburg was a very good experience.

We believe that this sort of relief work is one of the best ways possible for the peace churches to let the rest of the United States know what is meant by "love your neighbor." When we move into a disaster area with our own money, out of the goodness of our hearts, then our pacifism is going to take on new life and meaning for the rest of the United States. Stroudsburg knows much more about the peace churches than it ever knew before and it has seen our people at work. This is the kind of witness we need to continue to make to the whole country in every disaster area.

YOUR 1955-56 SCHOOL OF MISSIONS

Charles E. Zunkel
J. Henry Long

THERE is urgent need in the church for a comprehensive, vigorous and attractive program of missionary education. Because we live in a world of intimate inter-relationships, it is supremely important that Christians have world horizons in their thinking, concerns, outreach and prayers.

It has been said that ours is a mission in a "crazy world." It is "crazy" in that it is "broken in pieces, fragmented, disunited." Missionary education will aim at understanding this "crazy" world, its peoples and all their life and life relationships.

A well-planned mission school is a most important tool in the work of missionary education. If you are to have one, well-planned, you will need to begin at once, if you have not already done so, to plan it and set it up. A considerable supply of excellent materials is available for your use. Pastors, Sunday-school superintendents and missionary education people have already received Tools for Missionary Education which lists these materials. One important booklet which will be found very practical and helpful is Missionary Education in the Home Church 1955-56. It is available for 25c. Be sure to get it at once for practical help in setting up your school or study.

The basic study materials are those of the Friendship Press. They are excellent in quality and scope. Supplemental materials have been prepared to acquaint our people with what we Brethren are doing in the areas studied. The basic course should be on the general materials. One session or two may be devoted to our own work.

The Two Study Themes

I. The Home Theme: INDIAN AMERICANS

The study aims:

. . . to help us understand Indian Americans, their life, culture, hopes, fears.

. . . to appreciate the contribution Indian Americans have made to our culture and life.

. . . to sharpen our awareness of the struggles and problems the Indian American faces.

. . . to understand the white man's dealings for better or worse with the Indian American.

. . . to stimulate the Christian church to define and fulfill its role in the struggles of the American Indian.

Thoughts Following a Visit to Ecuador

Mrs. Vernon Kinzie
Tonasket, Washington

Rising at dawn, 3:00 to 4:00 a.m., to walk one mile or more for water is a regular chore for the Indian mother of Ecuador

IT IS interesting what things keep recurring in one's mind after a first visit to a foreign mission station. It is not the strangeness of a new place or the bewilderment of not being able to speak another language, or the new kind of food and coffee, but rather it is the awareness of the spiritual quality—the consecration, sacrifice, endurance and willingness to suffer, and the great joy and peace manifested in the prayers, Bible study and singing of first generation Christians. Such was my reaction and experience at our station, Llano Grande, Ecuador. This awareness was made real in our acquaintanceship with some fine men and women that I should like to introduce to you.

May I present Maria. She is a small woman, wearing a gaily embroidered skirt and a thread-worn rayon blouse, held together at the waist by a hand-woven faja (long narrow belt tied). Her cheek bones are high, her feet are bare and her hair is straight, worn in two long braids. Her hair is a little unkempt but I doubt if she has much time to comb it. After I listened to her schedule and saw her work I felt my husband's admonition fitting, "Don't let me hear you complain about your automatic washer anymore." Maria is up at daylight, three or four each morning, walks one or more miles after water, carries the five gallons or more in a clay pot on her back to her home and then hurries to the school where she gets a simple breakfast for eighty school children. Then, with the aid of a young girl, she prepares lunch for the children. They make all their bread.

Two afternoons a week she goes to literacy class, as she is learning to read. She considers being able to read the Bible very important if she is to continue to grow in her Christian life. One afternoon she walks to the missionary's home for a sewing lesson. Another afternoon she carries the clothes for her family—her husband and three children —to the water, washes them in a primitive manner, brings them home again, via her back, and hangs them on the cacti around her yard to dry. Each Saturday afternoon she gathers with other Indians for prayer and Bible study.

A full schedule? Yes, but not too full for her to go to Sunday school each Sunday at 8:30 a. m., and remain for the church service. (The benches are not padded, either, and the sermon may last an hour.) One morning she got up in the service and spoke like this to my husband, "Brother Doctor, when you go home tell the Christians to pray for us that we may be faithful." An interesting woman, so it seemed to me.

And now here is Mrs. O. The first time I noticed her was when it was her turn to read. Her hands were held against the back of her Bible, revealing the thinnest ones I have ever seen on a woman. Looking again, I noted she was all in black, from her head shawl to hose and shoes—a sign of mourning for a loved one. Also she was, as the Bible says, "great with child." Then the missionary told me she had walked two miles, each way, during her pregnancy, to both the Sunday services and prayer meeting. She, her husband, and five children live in a two-room home in Calderon, where he is the miller. One room is used for that purpose and they live in the other. That would be enough people for one room, wouldn't you think? But not for Mrs. O. A little niece and nephew live with them, attending the school and church, so, as she says, "they too may have the chance of becoming Evangelicals." Yes, her sixth child was born on Saturday after the prayer service on Thursday. That night the missionary took part of the group home, as Mrs. O. was so near her time.

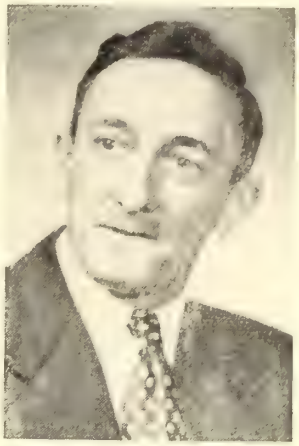
At that same prayer meeting you would have met Mr. C., the foreman of a hacienda and a member of the inquirers' class. (He and his family have been baptized since.) On this farm a midwife had left a young Indian mother-to-be, after trying for two days to deliver her. Then they came for the nurse of the station and the visiting doctor. In an unventilated room, five feet high by about eight feet square, surrounded by about a dozen curious people, hundreds of fleas, with the patient lying on a goat's skin, a live baby was brought into the world. All this time Mr. C. held a gasoline lantern for light, saying over and over, "Here you see manifested the love and mercy of God! Where else but in Christians is such?"

There are so many more I should like you to meet, but there is just not time enough. But come to their church and hear them sing. Their order of hymns is not very orthodox, but it works. First there was a welcome song; next the congregation sang a Christmas hymn which they were learning; the last of the first three was the Easter hymn, He Lives. In our time we have heard great music sung by famous choirs and artists, but none can compare with the spiritual awareness and vigor as young Christians, from the bottom of their hearts, sang, "He Lives! You ask me how I know he lives? He lives within my heart." As we listened there was a tug at our souls and tears in our eyes. To us, this was the secret of any success at Llano Grande—the Christ presented to them was no longer a dead man on a cross, but a living and vital Savior dwelling in their hearts.

SIT UP AND TAKE NOTICE



That's what happens when church audiences see the new sound film IN THE FACE OF JEOPARDY.

The contemporary struggle between Christianity and secular philosophies is woven into the story of one man's path from fear to faith. Doug Crane, the head of a large mining operation in southeast Asia, is conscious of unrest and dissatisfaction among the natives. The suspicions are verified as a Communist-inspired plot on his life is foiled by his native houseboy, Ah Chin. Doug's wonder over Ah Chin's loyalty is met by the servant's simple statement that he is a Christian. Doug goes to Missionary Phil Johnson "to get some answers," and accepts an invitation to make the rounds of mission stations with him. Having seen Christianity at work, he returns a changed person only to find Ah Chin has been the victim of Communist retaliation. A moving presentation. For junior high to adult. 29 minutes in length. Rental; in color, $12.00; in black and white, $8.00. Order from the Visual Education Service, 22 S. State St., Elgin, Ill.

Meet Your Missionary

Glenn H. Shank

Mrs. Ida Lindower

BORN at Mason and Dixon, Pa., July 16, 1921, to Harvey and Rose Shank, Glenn H., known to all his friends as Doc, was one of eight children, five girls and three boys.

He attended a one-room school for the first six years and later attended the public schools in Hagerstown, graduating from high school in that city. He spent four years farming before entering Ashland College in Ohio.

Doc participated in a great many activities while in Ashland College and Seminary: the Y. M. C. A., Gospel Team, varsity football and baseball. He managed a number of intramural athletic teams and acted as manager of Ashland College's lunch and recreation center. He also served as pastor of the Brethren church at Glenford, Ohio, and the Congregational church at Steuben, Ohio.

In the summer of 1952 he chose one of Ashland College's most promising co-eds, Jean Heck, for the position of Mrs. Glenn Shank. The following year he and Jean attended the missionary department of the graduate school of Concordia Seminary in St. Louis. In the fall of 1953, the Shanks went to Krypton, Ky. There they acquired experience as a preparation for foreign mission work.

Doc attributes his interest in missions to the inspiration received in summer young people's camps and to some of his spiritual experiences in Ashland College, in addition to his contacts with ministers and missionaries who visited in his home when he was a boy.

Although the Shanks looked for some time to the Philippines as a possible field for their service, they very sincerely maintained that wherever the Lord directed they would be happy to serve. When access to the Philippines seemed unlikely, and when the need in Nigeria seemed so great, in true missionary spirit, the Shanks interpreted this situation as one closed door and one open. They are very happy with their present plans and after their summer term at the missionary conference at Meadville, Pa., sailed for Nigeria.

Doc's versatility and adaptability should prove helpful in making him a successful missionary.

Christian Vocations for Women

Mabel Gibson

Clark

"I HAD always vaguely hoped that some day I might serve in the foreign mission field. But circumstances and talents did not lead in that direction," said Marie. "I have been teaching several years in public schools, but that doesn't satisfy me completely. If only there were some Christian vocation for women right here in America in which I could utilize my talents and Christian heritage and feel that I were helping to spread Jesus' message of love!"

This is the common feeling of young women who come to Bethany Biblical Seminary to train for a Christian vocation. Many of them have been public school teachers or B.V.S. workers, or have just completed college. They feel that their former positions did not quite fulfill their deepest, inner longings to serve God and their fellow men.

When I was graduated from Bethany Biblical Seminary there were six girls who received the master's degree. When we first came to the seminary nearly all of us were undecided as to which area of Christian work we would choose as a Christian vocation. But by the time the two years necessary for the completion of the degree were up, each of us had chosen our particular field of interest. One became a director of religious education in a large Brethren church, two became teachers of weekday religious education, two married seminary students and later became foreign missionaries and the sixth married a divinity student and is now serving as a minister's wife.

When I considered entering a Christian vocation many questions bothered me. Would there be a position ready for me when I completed my training? What could I expect in the way of a salary? Would I have much choice in selecting a position that utilized my special talents?

Now I wonder why I doubted about embarking on such a career. Actually there are many more positions available than there are women to fill them. Career guides indicate that there is an open field for directors of religious education in local churches. This is true in all denominations, including the Church of the Brethren. More and more ministers are seeking assistants to carry the load of an expanded church program or a growing membership. In other areas there are shortages, too. The state of Virginia which employs eighty full-time weekday religious education teachers sometimes hires teachers after the school year begins because of the scarcity of teachers.

The salaries of Christian workers are not as low as some might imagine. A survey of directors of religious education over the country shows that salaries range from $2,000 to $6,000, the average being between $2,400 and $3,600 a year. Weekday teachers are more often than not paid salaries comparable to public school teachers.

I have often heard fellow Christian workers remark about how satisfying their work is. This more than makes up for any salary difference. As a weekday religious education teacher I have the privilege of seeing much personal growth in the lives of the pupils I teach.

A fourth-grade girl prayed, "Dear God, help me to become a good mother of my children when I grow up." During a study of Isaac, the digger of three wells and one who refused to fight his enemies, a sixth-grade boy said, "They ought to send someone like Isaac to settle things in Korea" (this was during the time the Korean war was going on). A third-grade boy was debating as to whether he should send the pretty red whistle he had bought to the mountain children of North Carolina as a Christmas present or whether he should keep it. He himself was poor and never had had a whistle of his own. Finally he said, "If I keep it that other boy couldn't play with it, too. I'd prefer for him to have it rather than me."

The types of Christian work mentioned in this article do not cover the whole field by any means. Many girls serve the Brotherhood in secretarial or executive positions at the Brethren Publishing House. A master's degree is not always necessary. A major in Christian education is sufficient for many positions.

I like to feel that the call to Christian work in America is as definitely a call as that to the foreign mission field. In Elton Trueblood's book, Your Other Vocation, he says, "It ought to be standard for a Christian to accept a lower paid position rather than a higher paid one, providing the lower one meets his minimum needs and permits a far wider use of his creative powers."

A Boy and his Pumpkins

THE pumpkins are so big they almost overshadow the boy. He finds them convenient for leaning on and he knows they belong in any picture of autumn abundance—or at least they will serve for jack-o-lanterns and tasty pies. But they are symbols also of a November harvest, like corn in the shock and well-filled barns and silos. They bear witness that our horns of plenty are overflowing. In a material sense our cups are running over. We "never had it so good" before.

But if the pumpkins really overshadow the boy, if our material gifts tend to crowd out human values, there may be danger in our rich harvests. God is concerned with the persons we produce, the good crops that are evident in Christian homes with growing children. He seeks a harvest of righteousness rather than overflowing barns. He has placed an infinite value on even the least among children; and a man, said Jesus, is of far more importance than a sheep. Is he also of more value than a bank account or a stock quotation? Never let the pumpkin crowd out the boy.

Heathen Custom

I have often thought how heathenish our U. S. people have become in the way they lay their loved ones away in death. Lately someone remarked to me that present-day funerals cost from $700 to $1,000. What a waste of money entrusted to us from the Lord. I cannot link the show made at present-day funerals with true Christianity. In this world of need for the homeless, friendless and undernourished people, I cannot see it to be right to spend so much on coffins and flowers for the dead.

I used to do practical nursing work. One patient for whom I cared for ten weeks had lots of relatives and friends who came to see her but during my stay never was a bouquet of flowers brought for her which I am sure she and I also could have enjoyed and appreciated while she lay suffering and I tied down closely caring for her. At her funeral she had many, many flowers which represented lots of money paid for them. Also a very expensive coffin. I sat there during the funeral service thinking how much more good that same amount spent on her while living would have done as she was very poor.

Sometimes I wonder in our so-called Christian country if we don't need missionaries to teach us to live the simple way as Jesus did so as to glorify God and help the needy just as badly as the heathen do in their blindness. — Katie Patterson Rieley, Beaverton, Mich.

A Larger Field

I was favorably impressed with the article by Kermit Eby in the Gospel Messenger for June 25 and the articles Leland Nelson wrote after attending the tenth anniversary meeting of the United Nations. The United Nations constitution is not perfect, neither are the members perfect. Where can we find perfection? They have accomplished much good. The delegates and committees are trying to get international problems adjusted without war, have adjusted several, and have succeeded in having some countries pass a freedom of religion statute. The Christian church has a larger field for service than ever before.

The United Nations needs the prayers and support of the Christian church rather than destructive criticism. The National Council of Churches needs our support rather than criticism. The council asked the Brethren to help them to put across some of the fundamental doctrines the Church of the Brethren had been teaching from the organization of the church, namely peace and temperance. They did not ask us to give up any of the doctrines we taught before. We have a larger field open to teach peace, temperance, simple life and relief for the needy. Will we accept the challenge?

The shortcomings that are found in the council were in the churches before the council was organized. We need not contribute to the shortcomings, but we can help to develop an active Christian church full of good works. Some years ago one of the leaders in the Church of the Brethren said, "If your neighbor has a poor house, do not tear it down, but build a better house and invite him over."

Some people think since we associate with the National Council we should all teach and practice the same things. It would be fine if we all could do so. We can only teach that which we know, so we that have a background of peace, temperance and the simple life should teach and practice it until all may see how it fits into the Christian life. We should not try to get uniformity by dropping some practice. —H. H. Ritter, Albany, Oregon.

The Lord Is Our Refuge

"In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth" (Genesis 1: 1). This is probably one of the most familiar Bible passages among people today. Few of us probably have ever actually given a thought to what it really means. Whenever I am out walking I try to walk along slowly and think of the beautiful things which God has given unto us to enjoy.

We have a refuge in the Lord Jesus Christ. If we accept and obey his word we do not have anything to worry about. We must open our heart's door and let him in as the scripture states in the seventh chapter of Matthew, "Ask, and it will be given you; seek, and you will find; knock, and it will be opened to you. For everyone who asks receives, and he who seeks finds, and to him who knocks it will be opened."

Some people say that they are not ready or worthy to accept God and Christ; they are too sinful. God wants people as they are. He is able to cleanse them of their sins.—Patricia Brate, Middletown, Ohio.

The early insistence of Brethren on no daises was a testimony to community and brotherhood

BROTHER OR PROFESSOR?

Kermit Eby

ABOUT two years ago I accepted an invitation to speak in a Brethren church. As is my habit I started too early and arrived well ahead of the congregation. Not wanting to be conspicuous, I parked in sight of the church and waited until the congregation gathered before I made my presence known. As I entered the church, I was heartily welcomed with "Good morning, Dr. Eby! You are Doctor Eby, aren't you?" To which I replied "No. I'm Kermit Eby, A.B., Manchester College; my wife and I had a baby, and she couldn't support me any longer so I had to go to work." "Sorry, Professor."

A bit irked by the unnecessary emphasis on my title, I replied, "This is the Church of the Brethren, isn't it? And if it is, can't I just be Brother Eby and let it go at that?" My brother agreed. But his later use of the salutation Brother before my name was more than a little self-conscious.

This was for me no unique experience in Brethren audiences. In fact, it is my contention that Brethren (come-latelys into the world of degrees and titles) are more status-conscious than other denominations and schools I serve. At least here at the University, Mister is title enough for my colleagues to address me and my students commonly use my first name.

Furthermore, I contend that the emphasis on title and degree as distinguishing phenomena is indicative of a fundamental change among Brethren, a change so significant that it marks the alteration if not destruction of one of the primary characteristic values of Brethrenism; namely, that status is not a manifestation of the external but an indication of the integration of the man and his values. Respect given a man must be earned, not conferred. In fact, it was only possible if the character of the individual made its impact on family, church and community because of the consistency of its pattern.

This point can be best made by illustration: Grandfather Schwalm and the elders of his generation were respected primarily for the sense of wholeness which their lives expressed; for them a title given by the secular institutions of the world would have been a diminution of their true selves. If the time ever comes when I need a title to enhance the respect my students have for me then the title cannot accomplish its mission!

The reason for this foreignness to the world and its honors and emoluments was once indigenous to the Brethren culture. Theirs was a dimension which transcended the world.

It is this dimension I miss! Likewise I miss the outward expressions which gave witness to the internal integration. The very term Brethren fascinates me. It is an inclusive term, one which encompasses the whole family of man. How vividly I recall the story of the African love feast, told us by a Brethren missionary, Chalmer Faw.

The Brethren, he said, had been in Africa for some years. Converts were won. A church was established. And, as was the custom in the homeland, a love feast was held. The food was somewhat different, and gourds were substituted for bowls at the feet-washing, but the spirit was the same.

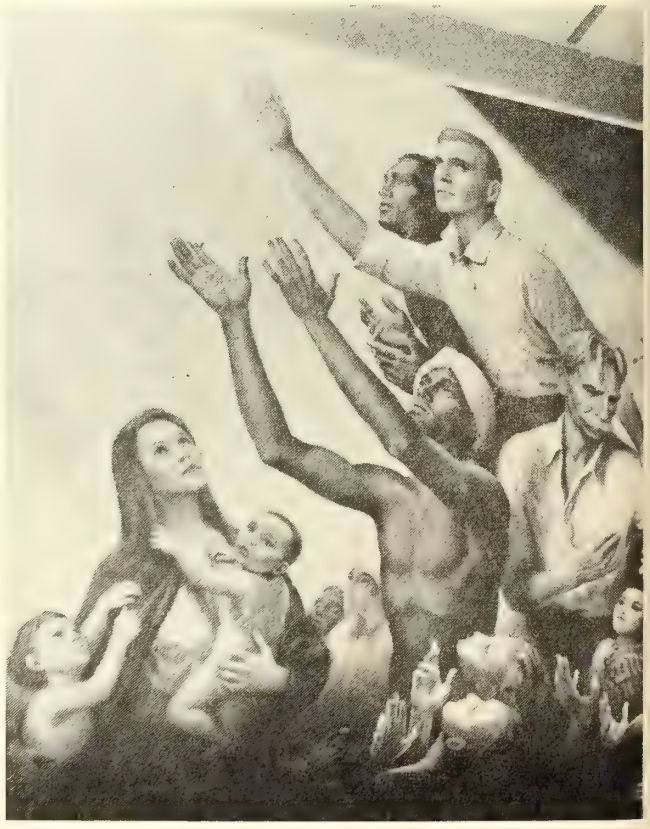
The tribe among whom the Brethren worked were known as the Buras. They enjoyed the love feast above all other religious experiences. They prepared for the occasion prayerfully, and the air was electric with anticipation before the hour arrived.

Soon the news of the love feast traveled far and wide until it reached Girgilling, a tribe located eight miles southeast of Garkida, Brethren headquarters. The tribe at Girgilling was called Whoma and their language was unknown to any white man.

The chief of the Whona came to Garkida and asked that the love feast be celebrated in his village. The Brethren hesitated. (The Brethen are a bit conservative, and there is no church in the Whona village.) But the chief of the Whona would not be put off. All will be taken care of, he insisted. Just come!

Still doubting, the Brethren accepted the invitation. On the date set, Negro and white trekked to Girgilling. When they arrived, everything was in readiness. Mats were spread under a large palm tree, plates were filled with food and water poured into gourd containers. So the Brethren, black and white, sat down to the meal. The chief, his wives, his children and tribesmen, yes, even his goats and dogs were gathered to watch.

During the entire service, held in a strange dialect, there was the most reverential silence. To this reverence, the mixed congregation responded. Never, says Bro. Faw, did they feel God's presence so near.



Awed by the welcome and the response, Chalmer Faw approached the chief of the Whona and inquired through an interpreter why had he been so eager to have a love feast in his village. The answer was simply and directly given. "Many times I have seen the white man take our land, impress our men and violate our women. This is the first time I have seen a white man wash a black man's feet."

Here in beautiful imagery is a world united as St. Francis envisioned it around the throne of God, including everyone of low and high degree in the embrace of his love. This is a vision which I think is incorporated in our very name.

Alexander Mack was wise indeed when he suggested the drawing of lots at the first baptism, so that the little fellowship of believers should look to no man for their beginnings. And I doubt if even Mack realized how significantly we are matured by community. One of the great heresies the early Brethren avoided was an emphasis on the individual achievement. That came later. Historically we began as a brotherhood, a fraternity and the kingdom of tomorrow was to be not only approximated but lived as nearly as possible, today. Whether we like it or not, the Brethren in Germany were Christian communists.

This is a revelation I miss, and one on which the whole destiny of Brethrenism rests. How can we create a world which incorporates the primitivistic Christianity of our fathers into the bloodstream of our lives? Otherwise, we become ever more secular and ultimately disappear. To be specific, the concept of the early Brethren must be applied

Conversational Note

THOSE who like to ponder statistics might well consider the significance of the telephone in American life. Latest figures indicate that there are more than fifty-four million telephones in operation in this country. These phones are utilized for an average of 205.8 million conversations a day. No one would attempt to estimate how many words are employed in such a staggering total of talk. It is safe to say, however, that many of them are idle, if not damaging. Even persons who are in no fear of wiretappers may often wish that some conversations could be recalled.

When the King James Version of the Bible was prepared the word conversation meant not only talk but all kinds of behavior. Instead of describing a discourse the word referred to a man's manner of life. Paul's advice to the Philippians about letting their "conversation be as it becometh the gospel of Christ" is properly translated "let your manner of life be worthy of the gospel" in the more recent version. Yet there is need today for a warning about conversation. Though it is not the same as behavior, it is one kind of behavior and it reveals plenty about one's manner of life. We could well afford to let our conversation—as we know it—be worthy of the gospel.

Perhaps we need a monitor to set a watch upon our lips. Newly invented machines will put through our phone calls, time them and record the bill, but no machine will guard our conversations against falsehood, slander, vulgarity or idle chattering. We must be our own monitors, concerned that our spoken witness be never a false witness but rather a testimony to truth.—K.M.

A Replacement for Davy

FOR parents who are weary of hearing about Davy Crockett and his exploits, for storekeepers who are sold out of coonskin caps and for Christians who want the next generation to admire better heroes than a gun-toting Indian fighter, we have a proposal to make. We suggest that Walt Disney consider another of America's folk heroes and let him replace the familiar Davy. The man we nominate as his successor is Johnny Appleseed.

Johnny, whose real name was Jonathan Chapman, was born not on a mountaintop but in Springfield, Massachusetts. Instead of killing bears at a tender age he was apprenticed to an orchardist and later went to Harvard to study for the ministry. But like Davy down in Tennessee, Johnny was a restless fellow. He never became the missionary he wanted to be, but he did develop into a kind of traveling preacher who was known as a sower of seeds and a planter of trees.

> I divide the world in three classes — the few who make things happen, the many who watch things happen, and the overwhelming majority who have no notion of what happens.—Nicholas Murray Butler.

Johnny also became a part of American folklore, but the actual facts of his career bear up better under close scrutiny than do the exploits of Davy Crockett, especially as told by himself. Johnny went into western Pennsylvania and planted his first orchards. Then he worked his way westward, always on foot, spending some time at Mansfield, Ohio, and continuing through Ohio, into northern Indiana. Although he was no Indian fighter, he prepared the way for new settlers. Even in the coldest weather he would walk barefoot from place to place, sharing his precious seeds, guarding his newly planted orchards.

Johnny Appleseed was a strange sort of missionary, but a true one. At night he accepted shelter in frontier homes, but he would refuse a bed and chose to sleep on the floor. He joined the pioneer families in worship and would read from the Sermon on the Mount. To one such family he expressed his unique faith, "I could not enjoy myself better anywhere—I can lie on my back, look up at the stars and it seems almost as though I can see angels praising God, for he has made all things good."

No wonder Johnny became a legendary figure. He planted the future of fruitful fields and blossoming orchards because he had a sublime faith in God. On his burial stone near Fort Wayne, Indiana, are these words: "He lived for others." While Davy had his brief moment in Congress and fought his Indian wars and died a bloody death in Texas, he left no such heritage of constructive service as did Johnny Appleseed.

Davy's symbol was a gun, but Johnny's was a seed. Let's help the rising generation learn that guns are dangerous relics, but seeds, as Jesus himself reminded us, may indeed be symbols of the kingdom of God. Why not drop Walt Disney a note with the suggestion that Davy is due for a replacement and Johnny Appleseed will fill the bill?—K. M.

STANDARDS -- PROCEDURES -- RESULTS

Charles E. Zunkel

A baptismal service at the Flat Creek church, Kentucky, where the membership has grown from nothing to ninety-nine since 1945, when the mission was started there

DURING the past ten years there has been a new and growing emphasis given by the General Brotherhood Board to the home mission development of our church. Much thought and careful planning have made possible standards through which the work has progressed with increasing efficiency. These standards have assured more careful decisions in location of new work, financing, choice of leadership and growth toward complete self-support.

Let us note some of the problems faced and the provisions made.

Adequate Financial Undergirding

It is apparent that there is a strong temptation to do "too little and too late" in financial support. Strong leadership, indeed the very best in the Brotherhood, is needed for newly developing work. Our strongest churches can more nearly get along with less able pastoral leadership than home mission congregations. But this means salaries that are comparable to those paid by strong congregations.

An adequate church plant is another "must." It is a simple fact, whether it should be or not, that people want to go to a clean, attractive building which can house a program geared to their needs. The building does not need to be one like our larger congregations have in size or costliness. We have been building only first units of the final plan of church edifice to be completed.

In addition there must be an aggressive, meaningful, satisfying program or ministry which the church gives to the people who are to be won through its efforts.

All three of these require financing in far larger terms than Brethren one time thought. It seems that very often we have poured little sums of money into home mission work across a period of thirty or forty years, only to have still a small, struggling congregation. Rightly or wrongly, it became a conviction that ordinarily a new congregation should be "on its own" in ten years or less.

Supplemental Pastoral Support

Since a first concern is pastoral leadership, adequate pastoral support has to be faced early in the planning stages. Sometimes there is no nucleus of members with which to begin; other times, in fact usually, the nucleus is small. Salaries paid cannot be less than the recommended minimum of the Brotherhood. Therefore, substantial supplements are needed to provide good leadership. But it "pays off" in results achieved.

In order to assure the principle of growing self-support the plan was adopted a few years ago to ask the congregation to assume one tenth of the original pastoral salary supplement each year, so that in ten years the entire amount is fulfilled by the congregation. This keeps the pressure on to grow in financial strength.

Since mission congregations should be at least as good stewards as others, four principles have been adopted and are being urged: (1) an adequate annual financial budget covering local and world-wide work; (2) an every-member financial canvass; (3) the envelope system of giving; (4) a program of stewardship education for the entire church. Interestingly enough our home mission congregations have been among those with the highest per member giving. Often it has amounted to from $100 to $150 or more per member per year! This far exceeds the giving of most of our older, larger congregations.

Capital Gift Grants

Careful planning has gone, and continues to go, into our granting of capital gifts for building purposes. In 1947 we began our first really significant program of such grants. Small grants had previously been made by the old General Mission Board. It now became clear that if new churches were to be established, more funds for building purposes would be required than the small nucleus group could provide.

However, first of all, such gifts needed to be given only after certain conditions had been met. Such things as the following were embodied in principles of operation:

(1) A careful survey to determine the advisability and possibility of building a congregation at the proposed place.

(2) Appraisal of all financial resources available, with local group and district co-operating to the extent of their ability to finance the project.

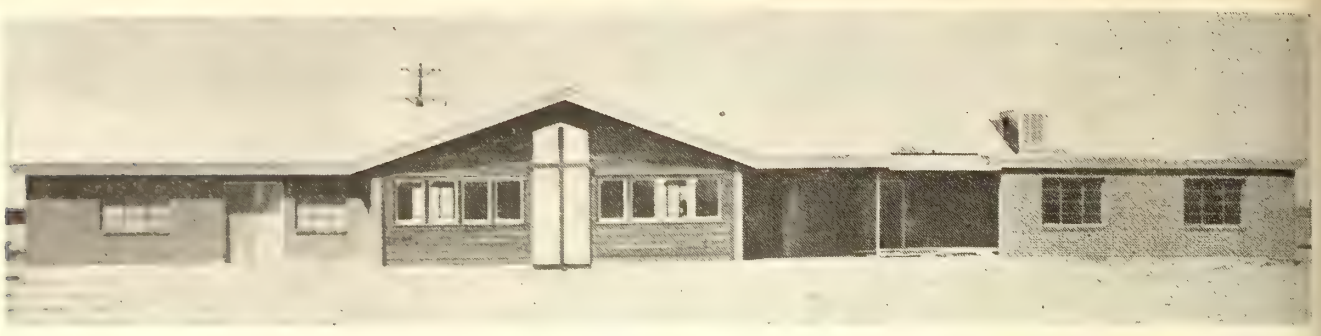
(3) Possibility of securing adequate leadership.

(4) Effort to determine quality, sincerity and spirit of present membership or nucleus group, with reference to the enlarging program.

(5) Decisions as to the nature of the proposed church: to serve only Brethren or to evangelize and serve a community.

(6) Review and approval of all building plans by the Brotherhood's church building counselor.

(7) All locations to be cleared for comity with local, county or state councils of churches, or some equivalent body.



(8) Attempt to plan developments in full co-operation with district boards, with the details of supervision carried if possible by the district boards.

(9) Grants for any given fiscal year to be made at the preceding March meeting of the General Brotherhood Board with all requests studied and priorities given on the basis of readiness and need.

Originally, capital gift grants were given only to churches receiving home mission support from district or Brotherhood funds. Later it became clear that some churches who have struggled to support themselves, and others who are in danger of their death, have possibilities for growth, development or relocation. It seems as wise to help save such a situation as to attempt to establish an entirely new congregation. Now all requests for grants are carefully studied, each on its own merits, and decided accordingly. Carefully filled out request blanks are required with the signatures of the local church officials, those of the district board and of the district and regional secretaries. For some time it has been basic policy to make grants according to need, but none to exceed fifteen thousand dollars.

Church Loans

Loans are constantly being made to these developing congregations, sometimes in lieu of grants, others in conjunction with grants. These loans are made from annuity monies entrusted to the Brotherhood Board and therefore must bear interest so the annuitants may be paid. Loans are made either to the district for the newly developing congregation or to an organized congregation itself, if its financial strength merits such a loan. These loans are secured by first mortgages on the property and are usually amortized over a period of ten years or less. Loans to any local church may not exceed fifteen thousand dollars.

A small amount of loan money is available to our mission churches on a noninterest-bearing basis for five years. If this fund could be greatly enlarged by gifts from generous friends of home mission development it would be a great asset in our work. The financial load of the struggling little congregation is such that their limited funds ought to be channeled into principal payments during the early years to reduce the debt load as rapidly as possible. Often the need for expanded building comes so soon that the original debts are not yet paid when more funds are required for the expansion.

Results of These Years

Always we practical-minded people ask, How has it been working out? What are the results? Show us the facts and figures. From 1947 through 1954-55 we have assisted in fifty-two capital gift grants for building development. In addition, we have given pastoral support grants to approximately one hundred congregations each year. Some of these developments have assumed full pastoral support from the beginning. Nearly all congregations are taking their regular ten per cent reduction in pastoral support each year. Some have gone off support in three, five or seven years. Look at a few illustrations:

Seattle, Olympic View. Relocated in 1949 with 145 listed members; currently lists 439. This church has now completed both units of its building. During all these years it has received no supplemental pastoral support.

Nicholas Garden, Oregon. Began development in building in 1948 with twenty members. Its present building is now found growing constantly too small for its membership of 145 and its much larger community from which people attend. It went off supplemental support September 1, 1955.

East McKeesport, Pennsylvania. Began in 1948 with a building purchased from another denomination and a membership of fifteen. It voted to go off supplemental support September 1, 1955, and its present membership is 128.

Flat Creek, Kentucky. Began as a mission to the people of the Kentucky mountains in 1945. There were no members. It now has two churches and four outposts and the membership totals ninety-nine. Each week two hundred people are in services. Supplemental support is continuing there but stewardship and self-support is growing.

Dundalk, Baltimore, Maryland. Work began in 1944 without a parsonage or church building. Forty-four members met in an IOOF hall. Since that time a fine modern parsonage and church edifice have been built and the congregation has grown to 250 members. Only a small supplemental support is now being given.

Stover Memorial, Des Moines, Iowa. The congregation was organized in August 1945, with fifty-one members. It worshiped in the Y.M.C.A. until 1949 when the first unit of the church was built. Since that time a fine modern parsonage has been erected and the membership numbers 161. It will soon go off supplemental support.

One could list an imposing number of such developments but space does not permit. We have here listed one development in each region except the Pacific Coast, where two were noted. It is inspiring beyond words to describe, to know the story of remarkable achievement in kingdom progress taking place in our home mission endeavors. But, Brethren, we have scarcely caught even the distant view of the unlimited opportunities everywhere at our disposal. I am certain the resources are ours as well. Let us rise up as men and women of God in this hour and build for him!

to property and every economic relationship today or our use of the term is a travesty on our origins. The Brethren love feast was once much more communitarian—the common dish into which we once dipped was symbolic of community, of man's sharing. Today our individualism and false concepts of sanitation are eating away at the symbolic which expressed the truest of insights: There is no life for man separated from his fellows.

Somehow it is easier for me to picture brothers and sisters around the common table than doctors, professors or even plain misters. From time to time I read that feet-washing is optional in some communion services in our newer communities. If so, let's no longer call them Brethren. Perhaps the most exciting idea which ever became incorporated in my miscellany of a mind was the early Brethren insistence that all communion tables be on the same physical level. The Brethren must have no daises, no promontories that rise above the people. Otherwise community and brotherhood is destroyed by hierarchy. What a remarkable testimony to the brotherhood of man! How incompatible such a witness is with the intrusion of titles which separate men apart from their fellows.

An understanding of the significance of our name and its symbolic expression in the love feast leads clearly to the rightness of the early Brethren in addressing each other as brother and sister (which they were) which significantly symbolized a common bond of love.

The titles we use so glibly today are divisive. They set us apart, projecting a false elite into a society which recognized only man's commonality. How terribly contradictory the title of President X and Doctor Y are, which are heard on every hand at Annual Conferences or which open the letters in too much of our Brethren correspondence.

Sometimes when I reflect on these aberrations I am almost tempted to ask, do we behave so inconsistently because we are ashamed of our heritage? Otherwise, why ape the world we once were taught was alien to us?

The labor movement to which I early gave allegiance likewise frowned on titles. Particularly in its organizing and utopian phase, brother and sister was title enough for men trying to build the common life and anything more than "fraternally yours" was superfluous in closing a letter. The reason for such a practice is obvious: when the vision of the kingdom was more important than the manipulation of power relationships, men wanted to be brethren. The Communists have corrupted a term which was once common among workers and exceedingly expressive — comrade! — one I would welcome back to common usage.

The greeting of the Brethren with a kiss is almost extinct except at love feast time, I am told. Odd, is it not that this should be so, that we should be embarrassed by such a greeting in one of the kissingest cultures of all time? Today the kiss of Hollywood is sensual in gesture and empty of meaning. Hence, I am always embarrassed by a kiss which is empty of passion.

But Hollywood's reasons cannot be ours. The argument that the salutation of Brethren can be expressed empty of sentiment is not our belief, or is it? If so, and if there is no real love of brother for brother, perhaps we should go the whole way and create a structural society with gradations of rank and status, openly acknowledging what tacitly exists. At least, then, we would be consistent both with our contemporary direction and practice.

Somehow I cannot help feeling that we lost much when we moved to the handshake at a distance. The distance is just great enough to bring worlds between us. But this argument need not be elaborated. I invite you to let your imaginations play. Ask yourselves if the insights of the early Brethren were not closer to man's needs, more unifying, less divisive, more egalitarian, than our present efforts to impress with degrees and status?

Or, if you want to be personal, isn't Brother more heart-warming than Professor? I think so!

Children do not tie mothers down; they set them free to learn to love as God loves. A woman makes her greatest contribution to life and reaches her highest achievement when she is mothering her children, giving love to them

Frances Bowman

Mothering Is Big Business

MOTHERING is my business and I am certain that my business is big business. We hear a lot about the huge chain stores, industries, cartels, the oil giants, but I feel that these so-called big businesses are really quite small and insignificant compared to the business of mothering. I propose to define mothering as giving love to children. The purpose of this writing is to increase the morale of mothers and to lift up the mother as the real queen of the home.

In America today we mothers need help in recognizing our supreme value as homemakers. Ours is a society in which women, when questioned by the man on the street about what they do, reply, "Just a housewife." Just! Or, worse yet, women are questioned, "Are you a housewife or do you work?" The implication is that homemaking is not work!

So our culture does not always help mothers to feel vital. The advertisements of radio, magazines and television do much insidiously to undermine the morale of mothers. According to the commercials, the ideal mother is one who has gleaming floors, consistently serves food which is "out of this world," who maintains immaculate orderliness at all times, who always keeps her children combed and scrubbed and shining and who is herself always smiling and beautiful and smartly dressed. Now very few, if any, women can live up to this impossible ideal of the ads, and because they cannot live up to it they sometimes tend to feel that they are failing to make a worthy contribution to our world. They often feel inferior and unworthy.

But let us not be deceived. It is not necessary and probably not even desirable to be the "glamor" mother of the ads. Someone has said that God must have loved the common people because he made so many of them. We might also say he must have loved ordinary mothers because he entrusted so many of the children of the world to our care. The keeping of an immaculate house can wait. But the little children cannot wait for their quota of mother love.

Very often a girl or woman in our culture is considered successful and important only when she has some unusual talent in music, painting, writing or housekeeping, or when she works outside the home for pay and is said to be "equal" with men. In our culture she more or less sinks into oblivion when she is married and babies start coming. Needed recognition and status and praise are not given to her in large measure after she becomes a "mere" mother. If she is gifted and intelligent it is rather widely assumed that in motherhood her talents are going to waste. It is commonly believed that when the children are small the mother is "tied" down and it is assumed that she cannot achieve real success again until her children are grown and she is again "free."

In place of this false thinking which is infecting our whole culture I would like to set forth here a concept nearer to the truth. Instead of the young mother sinking into oblivion, the exact opposite ought to be true. For undoubtedly a woman makes her greatest contribution to life and she reaches her highest achievement when she is mothering (giving love to) her children. Children do not tie mothers down, but they set them free to learn to love as God loves. Jesus has said that God is like a Father. He might also have said that God is like a mother. Surely mothering is Godlike and glorious.

The original meaning of the word kindergarten is child-garden and, surely, even more than a kindergarten, a home is a place where little children are grown, nurtured, cared for. Surely the church or community which fails to save its highest compliments for and give its greatest recognition to those women who are giving or have given full time to tending a child garden is doing a great injustice to all women and eventually crippling our entire world. Let us see just how this is true.

When we fail to help mothers feel that their job is vital, they leave off mothering as a full-time job and either choose second best jobs away from home or remain in the home with divided loyalty, resentment and distaste for their task, perhaps giving first priority in their lives to "house" keeping rather than to child keeping. Then our whole world reaps a generation of children and young people who are insecure, fearful and often even angry and filled with hate—simply because they have never had adequate mothering.

If we do not teach the mothers of our land how to give enough love to their children, these children who have been deprived of mother love may grow up to destroy our world with A- or H-bombs. Conversely, children who are filled with good mothering can grow up to use atomic energy to bless the world, not to blow it up. Yes, mothering is that important. Without adequate mothering, chaos rules in our world; with adequate mothering our world can have life in its fullest sense. It is because mothering is so stupendously important that we must take care of the people who do the mothering. We must take care of the mothers. We must go all out to keep up their morale. In every sense we can literally say that the business of mothering is a matter of life or death. We either wake up to this fact or we blow up.

I am assuming, of course, that our readers know that the most important year in the life of any human being is his first year and that if every child in the world could be given adequate

God Is the Source of Peace

Glen Weimer

GOD IS the God of peace.
God is the source of peace in human affairs and in the human heart.
God gave the world the Prince of Peace.
God is peace that issues from love, and love that issues from peace.
Peace is the fire of goodness, rightness, justness, integrity, love.
Peace is the fire of life struggling mightily against evil, and all that mars the image of God in man—making man less than man.
Peace is the fire of outspokenness in the face of sin and all that degrades life.
Peace is life dynamic—not stagnant or static—
Peace is life impassioned with the mind of Christ.
Peace is life settled, composed, secure and content through living in harmony with the will of God.
Peace is health of body, mind and spirit.
Peace is the will of God as the way of life.
O Master of peace, master me that I may be at peace and a worker for peace, everywhere and all the time. Arouse me to carry the holy fire of peace to every heart.
As old fires now dead are hard to re-kindle, so is the heart that once burned with the fire of God, exceedingly hard to inflame again. O Master of the flame of peace, keep me aflame with the peace of love, and the love of peace. Amen.

mothering the first five years of his life, all the really major problems of the world would be solved. For every human being, during the years after his fifth or sixth birthday and for the rest of his life, tends only to repeat the emotional patterns of either loving or hating which he learned from his mother. No wonder we mothers sometimes shrink from our big job, feeling inadequate for it.

Recently mothers have been blamed for all the ills of the world. Let's stop blaming the mothers and begin helping them. We mothers are frankly confused. We waver between feeling that we are important and feeling that we are not important at all because no one else seems to think so. The amount of physical work which a mother must do when the children are small is often staggering, not to mention her far more important task of giving love, love and more love—of mothering, mothering and more mothering. She tends to feel, "I have all these physical burdens and all this responsibility, and what do I get out of it?" It begins to look like all work and no play, and life seems almost overwhelming. The tragic part is that when this attitude prevails, some of the love goes out of the mothering. If the salt has lost its savor, wherewith shall it be salted?

Now let's face it. We cannot expect mothers to give love to their children out of a vacuum. They must receive love and recognition if they are to have any to give to their children.

"The hand that rocks the cradle rules the world." Let's stop paying cruel lip service to this saying if we do not really mean it. Let's help mothers to like their work. Let's honor them, so that they can do their business well.

Words That Have Acquired Worse Meanings

Luther A. Weigle

A NUMBER of words were used by the King James Version in a good or at least harmless or neutral sense, which now have acquired worse or more violent meanings. Base simply meant lowly or humble. "I, Paul, who in presence am base among you" (2 Cor. 10:1). Vile was no worse—"our vile body" (Phil. 3:21) is rendered by the Revised Standard Version "our lowly body"; and the poor man's "vile raiment" (James 2:2) is "shabby clothing."

When we read concerning John the Baptist that "the soldiers demanded of him, saying, And what shall we do?" (Luke 3:14), we get an impression of peremptoriness that did not belong to the word demand in 1611, when it simply meant ask. Riot and rioting referred then to revelry and loose living rather than to turbulence and violence.

Addicted was then employed in a good sense but now is generally used of bad habits. The King James rendering, "They have addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints," has been changed in the Revised Standard Version to read, "They have devoted themselves to the service of the saints" (1 Cor. 16:15). The word unspeakable tends to be applied now to bad rather than to good things; the Revised Standard Version therefore has "Thanks be to God for his inexpressible gift!" (2 Cor. 9:15), and "rejoice with unutterable joy" (1 Peter 1:8).

The word covet was used for earnest desire and zeal for the higher things of life, as well as for inordinate passion for its more material comforts (1 Cor. 12:31). The word convenient was applied to what is fitting and proper instead of to what suits one's personal ease or comfort or lies near at hand (Eph. 5:4). To tempt was sometimes used in the sense of try or test, without the present implication of seeking to lead into evil (Mark 12:15).

The "barbarous" were simply people who did not know the Greek language or share in the Greek culture (Acts 28:2). The "feeble-minded" were not mentally deficient, but simply faint-hearted (1 Thess. 5:14). The "Libertines," who appear just once in the Bible (Acts 6:9), were not loose livers, but respectable freedmen, who had a synagogue in Jerusalem.

The Peace That Passes Understanding

Louise North Gray

It is here, now.
It always has been and always will be.

It rises in the flight of birds at sunrise.
It sings in the twilight chorus of the crickets.
It breathes in the breath of the wind in the pines on a summer night.
It glistens in the face of a laughing child.
It grows in the garden of daily service.
It speaks in the words, "I understand."

It shines in the eyes of one who knows relief from constant pain.
It rests in quiet slumber after the fever of fear is gone.
It lives in the knowledge that time goes beyond all momentary concerns.
It upholds the life that withstands the assault of human failings.
It creates friendship in the bonds of mutual trust.

It is the infinite God blessing his own creation.

A Man's Last Words

Edward E. Lyons

AN INDIAN had spoken some careless words of gossip. For a punishment, his chief sentenced him to carry a bag of feathers to the highest hill and dump them out. After his return, the chief asked him to pick the feathers up again. "I can't," he said, "for the wind has scattered them." The chief replied that he ought to have been careful with his words since these like the feathers cannot be gathered up. This old story illustrates the importance of words.

Words can be as deadly as bullets or as healing as balm. Words can bless or words can curse. Our lives are built on the words we use. Our deeds are words in action and both are symbols of ideas which we hold. Little wonder that the Bible warns against idle gossip and the danger of an unbridled tongue as James does in his third chapter.

In contrast to man's evil use of words, we have the divine use of words in the gospels. The theme of John's gospel is "The Word." "In the beginning was the Word and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. . . . and the Word became flesh and dwelt among us." We have more of Jesus' words recorded in John than in any other gospel. We especially listen to the long disclosures which John records near the end of Jesus' ministry on earth. Our souls are thrilled with "In my Father's house are many rooms. . . ." and "I will send you a comforter and he will guide you into all truth."

Just as carefully we listen to the words of our loved ones as they die. To us the words of our dying ones are as important as the first words which we look forward to in our children.

Generally our last words are the sum total of our life. They reveal our beliefs and character as nothing else can. Occasionally there are last minute conversations like that of the thief on the cross, but usually a man dies as he lives. To illustrate: One man injured fatally in an auto accident which was caused by racing down the highway with another said to the nurse before he died: "I bet I could have won." Another man upon dying turned to his loved ones and said: "I hear divine music."

As we look at Jesus, we realize that "never a man spake like him." Jesus' words in his last hours were consistent with the words he used throughout his ministry. He healed the cut ear of the soldier, he prayed for the disciples in the garden, he asked God to forgive the men who crucified him and he said to the penitent thief: "Today you shall be with me in paradise." As Jesus' last will and testament, he gave us a new covenant in the form of the communion and the gift of the comforter. Jesus' last words revealed his life's actions.

We do not die or live alone. All of our words influence others beyond our wildest dreams. In our day and age, because of the inventions of radio, newspapers, and television, ordinary men have tremendous power undreamed of years ago. Our oral words can be transmitted around the world in seconds of time. We need thus to weigh carefully each word, for not only might it be our last, but we cannot tell when it will be set down in print for people to read years after we pass on.

Jesus' words lifted men and pointed men to heaven, to a high goal. His words and his actions make us aware that life is more than the piling up of possessions; it is a planning for an eternity to come. We are truly miserable as we become misers.

We too can help point others to the kingdom of God as we use words to help lift others to the sky. There is no challenge greater than to combine words in sentences which will help others to find God. This is becoming a steward over our words that we might become evangelistic. The final words in our dying moments, like the words of the two on either side of Jesus, can help or hinder God's cause.

Our denomination put out a little tract (which inspired this sermon) entitled Life's Sunset Can Leave an Afterglow. This was urging our people to consider their wills as a stewardship from God. It pointed out that most of us have dreamed of how we could best perpetuate our names. We realize that the coldness of granite reminders above our place of burial are only feeble efforts to make our lives known. Stones mean little except to mark the places where our bodies are returning to dust. All too soon even these slabs will be forgotten.

Instead, living memorials leave a kind of afterglow which we all desire. More people are beginning to realize that living memorials are better than expensive caskets and many flowers. Jesus set the example by giving us a will as mentioned before. He who owned nothing gave us everything and we are still basking in that afterglow.

We need to think more about the stewardship over the words we write on the paper which we call our will. Here in this last act, the words we use can bless or curse. If we have lived faithful lives, then these written words ought to be consistent with our lives.

Few of us can say that we have given as much as we ought to God during our lifetime. Our last words could provide a living monument so that other generations can bask in our afterglow. Even if we leave no more than furniture and ten dollars behind we ought to be able to leave a part of it to the church. Both rich and poor need to have a will to dispose of their possessions in a Christian manner.

There are many who are taking out additional insurance policies and naming a church-related college, a local church, seminary or some other special project as beneficiary. If this is done in love our story will be often repeated and will become a blessing as was the story of the woman who out of love annointed Jesus with the expensive perfume.

Truly dead men can tell tales. Dead men can continue to share their love with generations that come after them if they have prepared for it. The making of a will to leave all of our possessions or just a part is not only Christian but also a privilege to know that our possessions are used aright. In becoming a good steward over the words we use, we are thus becoming a steward over the possessions we have.

"And he [Jesus] said to them, 'Take heed, and beware of all covetousness; for a man's life does not consist in the abundance of his possessions.'"

—Luke 12: 15 (R.S.V.)

The Kiss of Peace in the Church of South India Liturgy

J. R. Chandran

At the meeting of the Central Committee of the World Council of Churches at Lucknow, India, in 1953, I attended a communion service as practiced by the newly organized Church of South India. Every effort had been made as this church was formed from many different denominational mission churches to include the most significant elements for their future church. I was surprised when the minister in the communion service said, "We will now practice the ordinance of the "Kiss of Peace." Again at the Evanston General Assembly a communion service was held after the order of the Church of South India.

I asked Dr. J. R. Chandran, principal of the United Theological College, Bangalore, South India, to give me a description of this service as he understood the practice of this new Church of South India.—M. R. Zigler.

THE Kiss of Peace is one of the important elements in the liturgy of South India in their service of holy communion. None of the churches united in the Church of South India had the practice of the Kiss of Peace associated with the sacrament of the Lord's Supper and people often ask about the meaning of this ritual.

It must first be pointed out that the Kiss of Peace is part of all the ancient liturgies and it must have originated soon after the apostolic times if not in the apostolic period itself.

The "Peace" is given before the breaking of the bread, just before the offertory and the elements are brought to the altar. Even though the practice cannot claim any direct New Testament foundation, it reminds one of Jesus' words, "So if you are offering your gift at the altar and there remember that your brother has something against you, leave your gift before the altar and go, first, be reconciled to your brother and then come and offer your gift." It is a symbol of reconciliation with one another. In the actual performance of the ritual the celebrant gives the "Peace" to the person assisting in the service or to a member of the congregation nearest to the altar and then it is passed from one to another until everyone has received it. In giving the "Peace" both hands are used, and the person who gives it places his right palm against the right hand palm of the one receiving it as in a handshake. The left hand of either person presses on the right hand of the other. The person giving the "Peace" may also say, "The peace of God be with you."

This ritual of the "Peace" preserves an essential element of the Christian faith, namely, that at the sacrament of the Lord's Supper God's grace is not only communicated to the believers as individuals, but to the community of believers. Only those who repent of their sins and intend to live in love and charity with their neighbors are invited to participate in the sacrament. Reconciliation of the believers one with another is therefore an essential element in the Christian witness. The Kiss of Peace is a symbol of this truth. It calls the members who worship together to get reconciled if they have anything against each other.

It is a reminder that the church which is the body of Christ is a fellowship of believers bound together by love.

The ritual also expresses the truth that the mutual relationship between members is not merely human. Human relationships are to be judged and sanctified by the love and peace of God. So the "Peace" proceeds from the altar. Broken relationships are to be restored by the power that comes only from God.

If You Could Run the World

Paul Mohler

SUPPOSE that you were present some day when God was holding a reception like that one recorded in Job 1:6. Suppose that you told God what is going on in the world that you do not like. Then suppose that he should say, "I'll give you all the authority and power that you will need and let you run the world for a while. Make all the changes you think best and see what comes of it." What an opportunity that would be! What wonderful improvements you could make!

Where would you begin? With wars, of course. You would stop all wars, abolish iron curtains and establish peace and goodwill among men of all races, creeds and nations. You would stop all crime, murder, adultery, theft, gambling, drunkenness, divorce and lesser evils. With all of these evils abolished, would not the world be a wonderful place in which to live?

How would you go about it? Where would you apply your power? Experience has shown that when individuals are changed, the mass is changed. You would doubtless change all people individually. When you have taken pride, wrath, greed, lust and the other causes of war out of all men, you will have stopped war at its sources. The same with other evils. Simple, isn't it? Why didn't God think of that?

But where would you apply your power—on the outside or on the inside? Restraint by external power is an old practice. It works to a certain extent, but it is expensive. It is responsible for much of our tax burden. If you add enough law-enforcement officers to stop all evils, I fear that we can never pay the necessary taxes. Then, with all the power and authority you must give them, they might become oppressors themselves. In other words, who will restrain your restrainers?

It might be cheaper to apply your power internally. Just place a governor inside each person to control his thoughts, ideals, aims, purposes, desires and decisions so that he would automatically be stopped from even starting in any direction that would result in evil. That would work, would it not?

Now let us see what you would have—two billions of beings that could not do anything wrong if they wanted to, but that could do anything good that they chose. Nobody would ever be killed or injured by others, no property ever damaged or destroyed, there would be no corrupted homes or individuals, no interference with anything good. What a wonderful world that would be.

After this had been going on for a while, I wonder what God would say about it. He might say, "Before you ever took over, I had all I wanted of creatures like that. Consider the coral polyp—how many of them I have working in the world, all of them doing good and none of them ever doing anything wrong. They laid the foundation for the state of Florida and of many islands in the sea. What I want out of the world is children—like myself, free to choose evil or good, but choosing good by their own free will. I want them to have many decisions to make, with strong temptations to resist, so as to develop their strength (Jas. 1: 12). I want to know what is in their hearts—whether they will keep my commandments or not (Deut. 8:2). In heaven, I want only those that can be trusted to go anywhere I may send them and do what I want them to do. No one who is not free to do good or evil can ever be a child of God. All who are restrained are of a lower order and the most restrained are the lowest. I have enough of the lower orders, even of such good ones as the coral polyp."

Maybe you had better limit the changes you would make to what you can do with the power and wisdom available in the Holy Spirit.

Reviews of Recent Books

Books are reviewed here as a service to the church. A review does not necessarily constitute an unqualified recommendation. Purchase can be made through the Brethren Publishing House, Elgin, Illinois. Titles recommended for church libraries are marked with an asterisk (*).—Editor.

Tribute to Jesus. Edgar Daniel Kramer. Christian Education Press, 1955. 56 pages. $1.50.

One of America's foremost Christian poets has written the reverent tributes to Jesus found in this little book. Each of the fifty-eight poems in its own way adds to the portrayal of Jesus as both historical and contemporary, as one who not only offers salvation but requires a high standard of ethics of those who accept that salvation. These poems would be useful for personal reading or devotions and also for group worship.—Ora W. Garber.

The International Lesson Annual —1956. Ed: Charles M. Layman. Abingdon, 1955. 440 pages. $2.95.

For less than six cents a Sunday teachers of the adult Sunday-school classes can provide themselves with what appears to this reviewer to be the best prepared bit of supplementary help we have in print for use along with our own Bible Study Monthly. This is the first in a series of such commentaries and is an outstanding example of interdenominational co-operation among Protestant groups. The arrangement of materials is logical and easily followed. Each lesson is presented under three main headings: Exploring the Bible Text, Looking at the Lesson Today and Teaching the Lesson in Class in readable, adequate terminology. Additional features, such as an alternative teaching plan titled For Group Discussion and Action, special articles on special Sundays of the church year, the annotation of the "Daily Bible Readings" add to the book's values. Roy L. Smith writes the major treatment on each lesson and he is ably accompanied by other writers of recognized effectiveness such as Floyd V. Filson, Chester W. Quimby, Ralph W. Sockman and Kyle M. Yates. Never to be thought of as a substitute for our own Brethren materials, this is the best supplemental material we have seen and should be in the hands of every adult Sunday-school teacher.—Chalmer E. Faw, Chicago, Ill.

The World of Albert Schweitzer. Eugene Exman. Harpers, 1954-55. 144 pages. $5.00.

Magnificent photographs coupled with well-chosen words combine their forces to give even the casual reader the tremendous benefit of a life which has been called "the greatest man in our generation." Excellent photographs by Eric Anderson show Schweitzer's ministry of healing, his life in Africa, his European home and family, and the place music holds in his life.

Careful selections from his writings plus appropriate editorial comments reveal the thought which underlies his life. This is an inspiring book for youth and adults who seek the inspiration of a great Christian witness. Every local church library should have a well-worn copy of the book.—J. Henry Long.

Ground-breaking ceremonies on Sept. 25 for two churches in widely separated areas, by a strange coincidence, featured the same method. At Scalp Level, Pa., nearly two hundred persons pulled the plow that broke ground for the new church house opposite the Old Folks Home. Raymond Boose, the pastor, spoke on the topic, Adventure Unlimited. Across the country one hundred persons braved the rain to draw the plow that turned the first ground on the site of the new Kansas City church, Mo. Here eighty-seven-year-old James M. Mohler helped to guide the plow and the two-and-one-half-year-old son of the pastor, Jonathan Bantz, had his hand on the rope.

Support of National Youth Project

Brethren young people, senior high and older youth, gave a total of $31,663.18 toward their goal of $32,054 for the 1954-55 National Youth Project. The project was the support of the entire Brotherhood program for nine full days. The giving for 1954-55 showed a considerable increase over the previous year, 1953-54, when $23,931.21 was given.

The junior high youth gave $1,843.69 in support of the National Youth Project not included in the above amount. Most of this money was given through their summer camp projects and is a sizable increase for the support of the Brotherhood program over the year 1953-54.

McPherson College

McPherson College began its 1955-56 school year with a 9% increase in enrollment. The increase was largely due to a greater percentage of upper classmen returning and through transfers from other colleges. The enrollment by classes shows the freshmen class numbering 117, sophomores 113, juniors 73, seniors 54. In addition to these students there are 54 specials, thus making an over-all enrollment of 411. Other interesting facts regarding enrollment are these: the largest number of students come from Kansas with a total of 175. Iowa is second with fifty-five. Colorado is third with twenty-one and Missouri fourth with twenty. By church affiliation, sixty-six per cent of the students are Brethren. Next largest group is Methodist with forty-five students. Twenty different denominations are represented. Five foreign countries are also represented in the student body.

Three new faculty members have been added to the staff. Kenneth Kinzie has come to assume the position of instructor of art. Mr. Kinzie graduated from the Art Institute of Chicago in June of 1954, with a Bachelor of Fine Arts degree. During his last year of studies he received the George Brown traveling scholarship for

Brotherhood Theme: Seek First His Kingdom

$1,250. Following his graduation he was employed in the field of commercial art as an art designer. Homer E. Brunk of Glendive, Mont. will teach the courses in rural life and agriculture, formerly taught by Prof. Guy Hayes. Prof. Hays has transferred to the field of education, speech and debate. Prof. Brunk is a graduate of McPherson College, holds a B.S. degree in agriculture from New Mexico College of Agriculture and Mechanical Arts. He also holds a Master's degree from Montana State College and has done work at New Mexico College toward his doctor's degree. Secured to serve as alumni secretary and assistant in public relations is Paul Wagoner. Mr. Wagoner is a graduate of McPherson College and has a B.D. degree from Bethany Seminary. He served two years as a pastor previous to his coming to the college.

One hundred twenty-one students are participating in the three college choirs this year. In addition there are two men's quartets, a ladies' quartet and a ladies' trio. Instrumental groups include a forty-five piece marching band, a string quartet and a civic-college orchestra. Fourteen tours to churches in the region have been proposed for the late fall and spring months.

The college is happy to report that the past fiscal year was closed with a $1,700 balance. The many contributions from churches, individuals and groups helped to make this possible.

The McPherson College Placement Bureau has been instrumental in placing twenty-four teachers during the spring and summer. Included in this group were eleven elementary teachers and thirteen secondary instructors.

President and Mrs. Bittinger have been giving leadership to several family life institutes. They have thus far this fall helped with these institutes in four states.

Leon Neher, a senior from Quinter, Kansas, is in school again this year after spending a year in India as an exchange student. From November 1954 until April of this year he was a student of the Government Institute of Agriculture at Anand, India.

Ralph Royer of Dallas Center, Iowa, Glendon Button of Eldora, Iowa and Lyle Neher of Oswego, Kansas, have completed their alternative service work abroad and are in school again. Ralph served in Africa, Lyle in Turkey, and Glendon in Austria.

The college had several representatives in the summer camps throughout the region. Former alumni secretary, Max McAuley, and his wife, Marilee, public relations director, Glenn Swinger, two students, Betty Holderread and Joyce Flory, and Mr. and Mrs. Bittinger, gave leadership in a number of camps.

News and Comment From Around the World

Church Groups Back Limited Clergy Plane Fare Reduction

Church groups would be willing to have reduced plane fares for clergymen limited to airlines that operate without government subsidies, according to a spokesman for the Interchurch Transportation Committee, which represents transportation directors of twenty-two Protestant denominations. The House Interstate Commerce Committee declined to act during the last Congressional session on bills that would have permitted all airlines to offer reduced rates to clergymen. Railroads have traditionally offered reduced fares to clergymen. Congress formally approved the practice in the Interstate Commerce Act of 1883 regulating railroad fares. However, the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1937 prohibits commercial airlines from making such concessions to any persons other than relief workers going to a disaster area.

Rockefeller Gives World Council $260,000 for Study Projects

John D. Rockefeller, Jr., has given $260,000 to the World Council of Churches for projects by its study division. Grants will be used for the following purposes: (1) a special study of Christian responsibility in areas of rapid social change, especially in Asia, Africa and Latin America; (2) study projects in the field of the Unity of the Church, the World Mission of the Church and Christianity and War; (3) housing accommodations for the staff of the Council's Ecumenical Institute near Geneva.

United Church of Canada Reports Gains

Membership in the United Church of Canada has increased by nearly fifty per cent since its formation in 1925 through a merger of the Methodist Church, the Presbyterian Church and the Congregational Churches. The denomination last year had a total membership of more than 894,000. The United Church yearbook gave the total number of persons under pastoral care of the church as 2,200,000. Contributions for all purposes to the church has increased to more than $4,300,000. The church's 1955 budget is $5,000,000.

Bill Smith

Joe Craun, president of Second Virginia men's work (left), welcomes Roy K. Miller, pastor of the Staunton church, as ministerial adviser to the men's work cabinet for the coming year. Looking on are Wendell Smith, vice-president, and Glen Sutton, secretary-treasurer. At the annual business meeting the men voted to continue the heifer project, to contribute $100 to the district program and $100 to the Bible school teachers in the district, to raise $1,000 for the Blue Ridge chapel development and to give $200 left over from the radio hour to the Blue Ridge chapel mission. Twenty-five heifers were sent from Second Virginia, given by nine churches and six individuals

Sees Revival Injured by "Ecclesiastical Cynics"

President Eisenhower's pastor has said that America's religious revival is being injured by "ecclesiastical cynics" who are making sport of Evangelist Billy Graham and Dr. Norman Vincent Peale. Dr. Elson, pastor of National Presbyterian church in Washington, observed that Mr. Graham's most vigorous critics are professors of theology and church administrators, and suggested they might feel differently if they had more day-to-day contacts with lay people. Both Mr. Graham and Dr. Peale have been guests in Dr. Elson's pulpit. President and Mrs. Eisenhower were in the congregation on both occasions.

Religious Work Decreases Violence Among Migrants

Religious work conducted among migrant farm laborers in New York this past summer by the state Council of Churches materially reduced the number of brawls and other incidents requiring police attention. Eighteen chaplains, most of them students at Southern theological schools and including some Negro clergymen, aided in the program servicing the more than 37,000 migrant workers. Many of the laborers came from the West Indies. The work of the chaplains was reinforced by twenty-six Episcopalians, Presbyterians and Mennonites of college age who volunteered for duty as assistants at three service centers for migrants.

Lists Rights Areas of Concern to Churches

Churches have as great a stake in human liberty now as when the Bill of Rights was adopted, Dr. Eugene Carson Blake of Philadelphia, president of the National Council of Churches, told the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights. He was one of twelve national leaders who spoke at a special Constitution Day session. The twelve were invited to tell the subcommittee what they think needs to be done to preserve, protect and strengthen America's constitutional liberties.

Warns of Shortage of Negro Clergy

A warning that the need for trained Negro clergymen is not being met in the United States was given at the annual convention of the National Baptist Convention U.S.A. The 4,500,000-member Convention is the world's largest Negro church body. Only about ninety-six Negro ministers are being graduated each year from theological schools. Eight hundred sixty-two are needed annually to fill the needs of all denominations.

Methodist Bishop Decorated by West Germany

A Methodist bishop was decorated by the West German government in appreciation of relief funds, food and clothing sent to Germany by Methodists. Bishop Frederick B. Newell of New York is national chairman of the Methodist Committee for Overseas Relief. Praising American aid to Germany in its post-war reconstruction efforts, the German consul general in New York said that, apart from official Marshall Plan funds, the "greatest contribution came from various church organizations in this country."

International Conference on Christian Drama

Under the auspices of the Religious Drama Society of Great Britain, an international conference on Christian drama was recently held at Oxford. It was attended by fifty delegates from fourteen countries, among others by T. S. Eliot. They discussed the possibility of a renaissance of Christian drama as a contemporary means of evangelism. Dr. G. K. A. Bell, bishop of Chichester, urged the delegates to be sensitive about the quality of plays performed in churches. "Once it is known that the church is demanding plays and takes only the best, the standard will improve," he added. "The drama and religion are not yet married but they are not so afraid of one another as they used to be. There is a shy process of walking out."

Clergymen Urge Voiding Internal Security Act

Eighty-six prominent Protestant and Jewish clergymen were among the 360 signers of a brief filed with the United States Supreme Court urging it to declare unconstitutional the Internal Security Act of 1950. The act requires members of the Communist Party of the United States to register with government agencies. In support of its assertion that the 1950 law is a "threat to American civil liberties," the brief quoted from statements of the National Council of Churches, the Methodist Council of Bishops and the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A.

Reports Russian Baptist Group to Visit U.S.

A small group of Baptists from Russia probably will visit the United States next year, according to an announcement by Dr. Theodore F. Adams, president of the Baptist World Alliance. Dr. Adams and three other Baptist ministers from the United States made a two-week visit to Russia in August. The group made preliminary arrangements for the trip by Russian Baptists. Dr. Adams says, "Relations with Russian Baptists were so cordial on our visit there that I think it opened the way for more groups of Baptists from America to go to Russia."

Recommend Hungarian Group Be Accepted Into Bible Societies

A recommendation that the United Bible Societies accept the Hungarian Bible Council into membership was unanimously voted by Standing Committee of the United Bible Societies at its annual meeting. Acceptance of the Hungarian Council would bring to twenty-four the number of national Bible societies in the organization. At a regional conference preceding the committee's meeting, it was reported that Bible work had increased in Russia, Hungary, Czechoslovakia and Romania. Delegates were told a considerable number of Scriptures printed in Hungary have recently been sent to Czechoslovakia and Romania, and Bible editions are being prepared in Russia.

Student Christian Council to Include More Negro Groups

Action to include more Negro colleges and universities in the student Christian movement was taken by the twelfth annual general assembly of the United Student Christian Council. About 125 delegates from over the country, including several Negroes, attended the week-long conference on the campus of Heidelberg College. The council is a federation of fourteen major church student movements and agencies and is affiliated with the National Council of Churches.

Christian Education Convention in Tokyo in 1958

Tokyo, Japan, has been selected as the location for the next World Convention on Christian Education in 1958. The invitation to come to Japan has the support of the National Christian Council in that country and a Promotion Committee, of which Dr. Toyohiko Kagawa is the chairman, has been active in presenting the claims of the Far East for the next world convention. The theme of the convention will be "Christ, the Way, the Truth and the Life."

Lung Cancer and Radiation

Dr. Richard Doll of the Statistical Research Unit of the Medical Research Council in London has suggested that the search for causes of increasing lung cancer should go beyond tobacco and industrial fumes and consider effects of atom and hydrogen bomb tests. He declared, "One thing is certain: an increase in the level of radiation causes cancer." In industry, he said, it is known that where miners had been exposed to a strong concentration of radium, the death rate from cancer of the lung had been thirty times higher than elsewhere.

EUB Church Groups Asked to Abolish Discrimination

Social action leaders of the Evangelical United Brethren Church called upon congregations and agencies of the denomination to "abolish all forms of discrimination." The commission also asked church members to work for desegregation in business, public schools, housing, unions and other fields. Members were urged to seek the passage of fair employment practice laws with enforcement provisions in states that do not have such legislation.

Greek Evangelicals Protest Turkish Riots

A message protesting the recent anti-Greek riots in Turkey was sent by the executive committee of the General Synod of the Greek Evangelical Church to the World Council of Churches in Geneva, Switzerland, and to leaders of Protestant churches in the U.S. and Europe. The message also rebuked those nations "professed to be Christian," which, it said, "encouraged the activities of the anti-Christian forces."

Members of the Oklahoma City youth fellowship make building repairs during a work camp at Camp Spring Lake, Oklahoma

BVS in Oklahoma City

AFTER two inspirational months at the Brethren Service Center at New Windsor, Md., I found myself on a bus bound for Oklahoma City, Okla. As I drew closer and closer to the city, I wondered more and more what the people, the church and the city would be like. At 9:30 p.m. on Feb. 3 I arrived at the bus station and was greeted by the pastor's wife. The evening passed quickly as I unpacked and talked to Reverend and Mrs. Stern about the coming months.

The next Sunday morning I assisted in the worship service and began to get acquainted with the youth and the other members of the congregation. The following week days were spent in visitation and setting up an office in the corner of one of the classrooms. With my office set up complete with desk and file cabinet, I was ready to dig into the job at hand. The youth file was brought up to date and put in order, and a card with all necessary information was made for each person in the youth fellowship. From the information on the cards, suggestions for youth activities were made, and planning sessions with the youth set up the program for the summer months.

Worship was added to the regular Thursday night fellowship meetings; discussion periods on subjects relating to youth and their problems were planned for each Sunday evening after the service. A series of films on dating, courtship and marriage helped to stimulate discussion. The youth also voted to take complete charge of the evening service on the last Sunday of each month and have followed through in a wonderful way. In addition to these regular events, a sunrise service and breakfast, a hayride, a swimming party, a work camp at Camp Spring Lake and other events were planned for and carried out by the youth group.

In addition to working with the youth I have been able to assist the pastor in taking communion to the sick and preparing for it at the church. Helping with the church paper and the Sunday bulletin is not uncommon although, I'm happy to say, cleaning the church after a dust storm or a heavy rain is. Teaching Sunday school and vacation Bible school has given me an opportunity to observe how the younger boys and girls really think and act; I must add that I have learned as well as taught. Some of the other activities that may come up during the week are mowing the yard, meeting with the recreation or worship committee for the coming Thursday evening, making a poster, chart or sign, or practicing with the choir. Late in the summer I had the opportunity to attend district conference and serve as a counselor at youth camp.

For recreation, there are short trips and picnics with the Sterns, playing softball with the church team, taking pictures and going with the youth group after their meetings are over.

One of the unique experiences I have had since I have been here has been the opportunity to deliver the Sunday morning message. Reverend Stern had had his tonsils removed and had not recovered in time; so he asked me to fill in for him. It was a great experience to prepare and deliver such a talk for a group of people.

Any youth who wants to improve himself, aid others and find God can do all three at the same time if he will just take a year of his time for BVS. I use the term "take" because I believe it more accurate. A youth can learn, improve, grow and mature very much during this time. He will see so much new country and meet so many wonderful people that it will soon seem that he is being ministered to rather than ministering. It might be summed up in 2 Cor. 9:13-14: "Under the test of this service, you will glorify God by your obedience in acknowledging the gospel of Christ, and by the generosity of your contribution for them and for all the others; while they long for you and pray for you, because of the surpassing grace of God in you."

Our Refugee Family

William M. Hollinger

SCARCELY a year ago in Camp 121, one of the seventeen refugee camps near Salzburg, Austria, lived a German family: Kurt, the father, Elfriede, the mother, Gerlinde, the daughter, and Harald, the infant son. The Mueller family had spent eight years here, waiting, hoping for an opportunity to come to America. After they had registered their desire to come, their hopes would rise when a new quota would be stated for refugees. Despair would claim them as quotas were filled by others who had relatives in the United States or were fortunate enough to have a sponsor.

"We hadn't a chance until we had a sponsor," said Kurt when we called in his home in Dayton, Ohio.

In April of 1954 the East Dayton church had signed the assurance for the Muellers and had thus become their sponsor. The Muellers waited hopefully while the necessary arrangements were being made for their trip to America. Anticipation became keener in the fall of 1954 when Bro. Beeghley made contact with them. Though the language barrier prevented easy conversation, our fellowship with them was begun.

Then came the visa on Jan. 20, 1955, and their spirits soared as they enplaned for New York.

Now in August we found them settled in a comfortable home and doing well. They are happily planning for the future, for Gerlinde to enter school next month, for Kurt to enter night-school classes, and, in due time, for all to have full living as American citizens.

Kurt was asked what things here he liked in contrast with his former life in Europe. As he twisted uneasily in his chair to think, he responded with a smile: "Oh, everything!"

This is their present; their future is promising.

But what of nearly a thousand other refugee families the thousand congregations of the Church of the Brethren can so easily sponsor? They are waiting yet, hoping, despairing, struggling to exist in crowded camps, victims of our country's war. We have pledged ourselves to give assurances for a thousand this year.* If we use this opportunity, the refugees will be helped, God will be glorified and other avenues of service will be opened.

The Mueller family is the third the East Dayton Church has sponsored the last few years. All three have been very co-operative with the church and appreciative of what has been done to help them adjust themselves, repaying gladly and promptly the funds advanced to them. We can testify that all of us—refugees and Brethren—have been blessed in this service of sharing the American way of life.

Remember Kurt's remark, "We hadn't a chance until we had a sponsor." Give some other Kurt and Elfriede a chance.

This quota must be filled in time for families to have secured their visas by the end of 1956. What we do this year is exceedingly important because of the length of time required to secure a visa after sponsorship is given. If you or your congregation can give an assurance for a refugee family, write to the Refugee Resettlement Office, Brethren Service Center, New Windsor, Md.*

MATERIAL AID Project-of-the-Month

FRIENDSHIP PACKETS for Christmas! This is a project in which men, women and children can participate! Why not make it a family project?

The Children's Kit consists of a spiral ring notebook, a game, crayons, pencils, an eraser and a sack of hard candy, all pinned between two washcloths.

The Mother's Kit is made by stitching a large comb, bobby pins and a nail file inside a large head scarf.

To make a Father's Kit sew (by hand) a razor, blades and shaving soap inside a large handkerchief.

These projects are explained on pages eight and nine of the MATERIAL AID HANDBOOK. Copies of the Handbook may be obtained by writing to the Director of Material Aid, Brethren Service Center, New Windsor, Md.

Evangelism in the Church School

Stewart B. Kauffman
Director of Ministry and Evangelism

From the filmstrip, Plainview's Awakening

The teacher is a key evangelist in the local church organization

THE church school is one of the most important evangelistic organizations within the church. Pastors, evangelistic committees, official boards have long recognized that in order to organize the church effectively to do the job of evangelism, they must give primary attention to what is happening in the Sunday church school. It is safe to say that more than eighty-five per cent of our new church members belong to the church school or have been members of the church school.

The teacher, therefore, is a key evangelist in the local church organization. In the classroom situation he has close personal contact with the pupils. Over a period of years he learns to know not only the pupils in his class that particular year, but the families to which the pupils belong. Recognition of the importance of the church school and its teaching staff in the whole program of evangelism of the local church points up areas that need major attention if our church school is to be evangelistic.

Evangelism Is the Job of the Whole Church

In the first place, the whole church needs to be organized to share Christ to the end that individuals will become new persons in Jesus Christ. Let us never more be guilty of thinking that the church and the church school are two organizations functioning side by side, each conducting its own program, but let us see that the Sunday church school is a school of the church organized to help attain the ends for which the whole church exists. In that light the church school unites with all other arms of the church to accomplish, what the American Baptists have so well called, The Great Objective, which is to help to bring persons into fellowship with Jesus Christ so that they become new persons in him, and then work along with other Christians to evangelize the world.

Preparing the Teacher to Be an Evangelist

If the teacher is the key person in the evangelistic program of the church school, the church must do all it can to help the teacher to be an evangelist. The committee will want to know: Is he a person who is committed to Christ and the church? Is he a person with a winsome, contagious faith? Does he have the ability to teach the group to which he is assigned? Is he trained for the job or is he willing to take training and to grow?

Having chosen the teacher, the church must then do all it can to help him do the job. A number of steps are important here.

1. Before a new teacher goes to work, it would be most helpful if the general superintendent, or the departmental superintendent, would explain to the teacher the general over-all purpose for the church school and perhaps the purpose for that particular class. There would be a number of benefits from this practice. For one thing it would mean that the committee on Christian education as well as the officers of the school would need to decide why the school exists. What are we driving at? Why do we meet each Sunday morning and even have additional sessions during the week? The discipline of putting the purpose down on paper would probably be a great evangelistic step in the life of the entire school. And think what this practice would do to the teacher! This would be a high calling of God in Christ Jesus and it would undoubtedly challenge any teacher.

2. A second step in helping the school to be evangelistic would be to have at least one workers' conference a year on the subject of evangelism in the church school. There are excellent filmstrips and study guides that would be helpful in renewing enthusiasm for the evangelistic possibilities within the school. Moreover, this could be a time when teachers could share with one another the literature they are reading and the success they are having. Various methods of evangelism could be discussed to the benefit of all.

3. A school of evangelistic teaching should be held periodically. While this could be a subject for a class within the local church or a community leadership training school, an even stronger approach would be for the local church to conduct this school at a specific time so that all teachers would be included. At this time general methods used in winning pupils to Christ could be shared. Although the methods should differ from age to age, the over-all purpose is still the same. In this school it would be important to review what it means to accept Christ and to join his church.

4. Departmental meetings are also important in helping to create the feeling of evangelistic responsibility throughout the church school. In such meetings departments would come to a specific understanding of the methods and aims for their age group. It is very important to understand the age group with whom one is working.

The Teacher Can Be an Evangelist

Fortunate is the teacher who works in a school where the leadership sees the importance of evangelism. This will inspire him to personal responsibility in the whole program. There are certain guiding principles for the teacher to take seriously.

1. Let the teacher constantly work at deepening his own faith in God and love for Christ and the church. A Christian teacher needs to have a radiant faith that exemplifies the truth he teaches.

2. The teacher should strive to know his pupils, for, unless he is relating the material he has to teach to the individual pupil, he may be wasting valuable time. In order really to know his pupils, he will need to do some work. Home visitation is essential because the pupil lives in a family fellowship and the home has a profound influence on the pupil's life, having much to do with his spiritual development. Class fellowship meetings, periods of recreation, worship, individual counseling are opportunities of extreme importance to the teacher who is alert and is eager to help individual growth.

3. Preparation through personal daily devotions, study of the Bible, other church school literature takes on real meaning to a devoted teacher. Likewise, he should welcome opportunities to attend conferences and leadership schools in order to prepare himself adequately for his job.

4. He should constantly renew in his mind his purpose for teaching. If there is no purpose there is no teaching. But he must analyze his purpose to see that it is worthy of a Christian teacher in the church school. Also, he must ask if the many activities in which he is engaging are in keeping with the purpose for teaching.

5. Finally, let the teacher evaluate his work. Certain searching questions can help to do this. Have my pupils changed? Is there evidence that they have grown in their love for God and their fellow men? Is God more real to them now than he was a year ago? Is their understanding of God in keeping with the life and spirit of Jesus Christ? What happened to the pupils who were graduated from my class last year? Are they a vital part of the whole church fellowship? Any teacher who seriously follows the growth and development of his pupils is on the way to being a good teacher.

In Summary

Evangelism is a program of the church that we cannot pick up and lay down at will. Everything the church does helps to make it effective or ineffective in its great purpose for existence. The church school is one of the most important evangelistic organizations within the church. The teacher, therefore, is a key evangelist who seeks to help the spirit of Jesus Christ become a reality in the lives of children, youth and adults.

Leadership Training Bears Fruit in Nigeria

Mary Eikenberry
Nigeria, West Africa

Pilesar, who with her husband had spent three years at the teacher training center, carries water

JUNE 11, 1954. Rain boots, mosquito nets, baked beans, first aid kits, Bible and songbook, water, canteens, bedding, clothes—finally they were all packed in a "chop box." And the four older Eikenberrys were ready for a ten-mile trek to the village of Sura. It was soon raining hard and the prospects of a trip to the back country looked hazardous.

Our first stop was Shafa. When we arrived there the Harold Royers were surprised we had made it. Harold soon had the horses and loads ready and we were on our way to Sura.

As we started down the steep escarpment we were a heterogenous group. Three men carrying head loads were ahead. Behind them, Mary Eikenberry on horseback, then Yerkoa, the blind evangelist who works in the Shafa church and the twenty villages around Shafa, then Harold Royer on his horse, then Melody and Joel Eikenberry, aged twelve and eight on the same horse. Ivan Eikenberry on foot brought up the rear. Over rocks, through streams, down hills and through the bush for three hours until we reached Sura. They had expected us, but after the rain, they did not know if we would come.

In 1947, Ivan had been the first white man to visit the village. Since then Linus had come as a teacher; he had been followed by Yakubu and his wife, Pilesar. They have been there four years now and much has been accomplished. A nice church school building has been built with an additional school building, built of grass mats, to take care of the overflow.

People came to greet us, to tell us how glad they were we had come. Soon after we had eaten supper, the bell rang and those people wanting to be baptized and to make a first public confession of belief on Jesus came for interviews. Ivan, Harold, Yakubu and Yerkoa met with the group. Yakubu and his wife had spent three years at our teacher training center and it was indeed thrilling to see the harvest from those long hours of teaching and struggling to plant a point or an idea.

We visited until almost midnight. Melody and Joel had crawled under the nets on grass mats and blankets. Ivan and Harold came to bed soon after, having twenty-eight people ready to take the covenant and fourteen ready to be baptized next day. This was the result of years of teaching and training by Yakubu and other African evangelists.

The next morning, as soon as we had eaten breakfast we met at the church and went singing to the stream near by for the baptismal service. There had never been a baptism at Sura before so the people were interested and curious. Eight women and six men were baptized. One of these women is the wife of the elderly man who first brought the news of the Christian way to Sura. He had gotten it at Garkida at the hospital and he did not give up until he got a teacher.

He took the covenant several years ago, but cannot receive baptism because he has two wives. (Would that Christ were here to help us solve that difficult problem.)

Back at the church we had a sermon, music, prayer and then twenty-eight Nigerians made their public confessions. Two hundred people were packed into the church. There was no unnecessary talking and everything was done in order. The twenty-eight men, women, boys and girls stood before the congregation and accepted Jesus as their Savior. Yakubu and Pilesar will continue to show them the way.

By two o'clock we were back on the trail again. The journey went fast as we returned. There was much to think about. Did Melody and Joel get a better understanding of why mother and daddy both must teach six hours of school tomorrow? Will Pilesar have her expected baby without any trouble? What can we do to make one hundred per cent of our Waka teacher trainees have the zeal of this couple? This trip helps us to see once again how very important a part of the mission program is that of training Christian teachers. May God guide us in our program at Waka to train more Yakubus and Pilesars so that his kingdom may come here.

Meet Your Missionary

Jean Heck Shank

Mrs. Ida Lindower

MRS. GLENN SHANK, formerly Catherine Jean Heck, is one of two daughters born to Vernon and Roberta Heck, Hagerstown, Md. Jean received all of her public schooling in Hagerstown. After graduating from high school she spent some time doing blueprinting. She is quite skillful in drawing, printing and art work in general. Later she took nurse's training at Union Memorial hospital in Baltimore, where she received her R. N. degree.

In her capacity as a nurse, Jean worked among polio patients in the Carolinas, as a cadet on a government Navaho Indian reservation, then while a student in Ashland College as school nurse.

At Ashland College she engaged in a variety of activities, among which were the Girls' Gospel Team, Y. W. C. A., and a cappella choir. She was named in "Who's Who" among college students and was elected to Alpha Kappa Gamma, honorary society for college graduates maintaining high scholastic rating. She received the A. B. and B. S. degrees.

After spending a year at Concordia Seminary studying missionary work and a year at Krypton, Ky., acquiring some home mission experience, Jean is looking forward to service in Nigeria.

While the Shanks were in Krypton, little Dennis Glenn Shank came to live with them (Dec. 15, 1953). This fine, sturdy little chap will go with his parents to Nigeria and should be a source of joy to them.

Jean declares that she has always been interested in missionary work, but the interest has intensified with the passing of the years to become a genuine call. Jean's training and experience as a nurse, her qualifications as a teacher and her excellent personality and high degree of intelligence should go far in making her a successful missionary. To do her justice, a quotation from Matthew Arnold serves most adequately:

> . . . a soul tempered with fire,
> Fervent, heroic and good;
> Helper and friend of mankind.

Yakubu, Pilesar and Isa have family worship. Their enthusiasm and devotion are leading others to Christ

The new chapel-parsonage at Erie, Pennsylvania, dedicated August 14

A Church Develops at Erie

IN THE mid 1800's Clarion congregation embraced the counties of Northwestern Pennsylvania, including Erie city and county. The Clarion congregation was disorganized in 1905 and no record of its membership remains. However, in 1918 Brother and Sister Edmond G. Hetrick moved to North East, fifteen miles east of Erie, where they now reside. They are members of the Erie congregation.

The Brotherhood nonresident membership file in 1950 listed almost one hundred members living in or near Erie. A request for services came in January 1951 and was referred to Western Pennsylvania mission board. This resulted in the services of a summer pastor, Bro. Daniel Flory, during that summer. The Seventh Day Adventist church on East Tenth Street was rented for services.

When Bro. Flory returned to the seminary at the close of the summer, Bro. William Barmeister, a Mennonite, supplied the pulpit until the following summer. Bro. Tom Shoemaker served as summer pastor in 1952. Bro. Alvin G. Faust became the supply minister in December 1952 and for nineteen months he made trips from Pittsburgh to Erie to minister there.

In June 1954, Bro. W. J. Hamilton became the first resident minister of the Erie congregation. A prefabricated dwelling on West Thirty-sixth Street was rented and used for services until July 30, 1955, when the present permanent parsonage on Raspberry and West Thirty-sixth Streets became the chapel-parsonage for this growing young congregation.

The Erie fellowship has gone through many of the struggles such endeavors encounter. However, in spite of them they have grown in solidarity, in purpose and in size.

In October 1953 Western Pennsylvania in conference gave them authority to organize as a congregation. This was consummated on Jan. 22, 1954, when nineteen letters were read. One was added by baptism and an organization was effected.

On Aug. 14, 1955, the dedication service for the new chapel-parsonage was held. There were representatives from the Erie Council of Churches, Western Pennsylvania, and neighboring churches who shared in the responsibilities of the occasion. Bro. John D. Ellis, chairman of Western Pennsylvania district board, gave the dedication address.

In all of the development of a final location for our work in Erie, we have co-operated closely with the Erie Council of Churches. The council has given us comity assignment for the newly developing area in which we seek to serve. In addition to the chapel-parsonage we have lots purchased near by which will afford us our location of a future church building.

The new chapel-parsonage will give good housing for our work at present. The membership on the day of dedication numbered fifty-one. We look forward to continued growth and progress in the city of Erie.

Church News

Northern California

Lindsay—The basement of our church has been resurfaced and painted and the sanctuary has been redecorated. The Gospel Messenger welcomes letters commenting on editorials, articles and news. Letters should be brief and brotherly.

Where Goes Your Support?

Almost every day we receive letters and material from nondenominational schools, radio programs and faith missionaries, saying how many missionaries are being sent out and how many people are being saved. This is all done through faith. Faith in what? In the support from the people of our own denomination and others. They do not go to the people of the world because they know they are not interested in supporting them. The organized church is the only place they can go for that support.

We had one of these missionaries come into our church sometime ago and solicit support from some of our own members to keep him on the foreign field. He went out in the name of his school but he sought his support from individuals in our church.

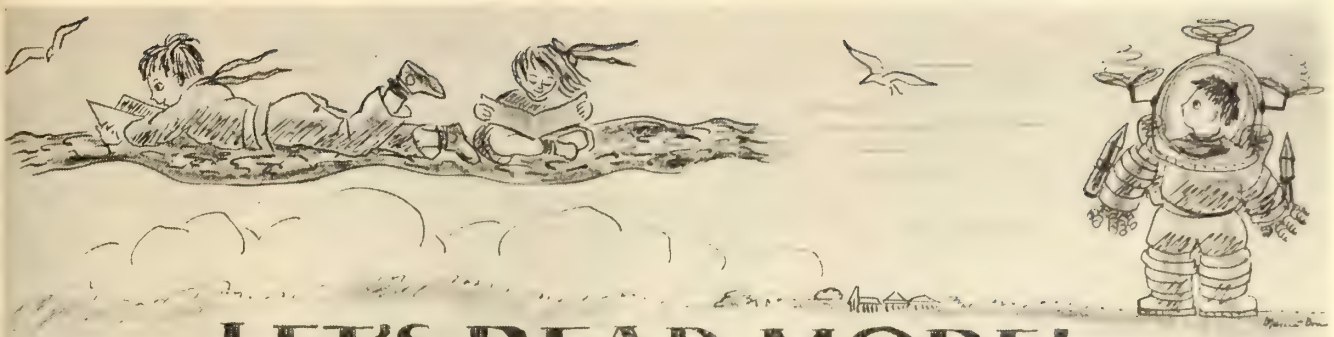
These nondenominational schools are also telling our young people that our denominations are modernistic. They in turn come back discouraging others about the work of the church. They don't like our denominations but they like our money.

One such school trains missionaries in only three months. I really was interested in this as I would like to be a missionary myself and whole families could take this three months' training free. Free—by our support again through donations. I studied their material to see where their missionaries were sent and what type of work was done. I noticed that their witnessing is done in places where missionaries of other denominations and our own have laid the ground work that sometimes takes years to do. Those things are not mentioned, only the harvest of souls in mentioned.

Jesus said in Matt. 25:42-43, "For I was an hungered and ye gave me no meat: I was thirsty and ye gave me no drink: I was a stranger and ye took me not in: naked, and ye clothed me not, in prison and ye visited me not." He went on to say that if we did not these things that we would depart from him into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels. We have to do these things along with witnessing but some have the idea that we need only to preach the word.

Our church keeps plugging along, working in the background, not going into other churches begging for support. Is your support going into your own church or is it paying for some of the things mentioned above? Radio is wonderful. Our own denomination can use it too, but it is for a message and not to beg for support. Our missionaries and service workers can carry the greater message. Let's stand fully behind our church in its work.—A Pastor's Wife.

Conviction of Founders



"Who Is the Heretic," Oct. 8, is a masterpeice of editorial guidance. Thank you for it. It calls to mind the conviction of our church founders quoted by Benjamin Franklin in his Autobiography, that they had agreed not to declare a formal creed because "it had pleased God to enlighten our minds so far as to see that some doctrines which were esteemed truths, were errors, and others which we had esteemed errors, were real truths. Now we are not sure that we have arrived at the end of this progression. . ."

Franklin commended this modesty of the Brethren, calling it a single instance in the history of religion. "Every other sect," he said, "has supposed itself in possession of all truth." The most treasured heritage of the Church of the Brethren is our belief that our creed can and will go on growing as we study the New Testament, from generation to generation. In this way we cannot escape the impact of great convictions that will be revealed by our daily walk and conversation, growing in the "unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God."—Mrs. L. T. Weddle, Girard, Ill.

"Love and Mercy"

A year ago when a foreign student came to us for the Thanksgiving holiday visit, one of our Christian obligations was challenged. The student assigned to us by the Farm Bureau youth group was a Jewish young man from Israel.

Christians love the Jews because the Lord God used them to bring salvation to all (Gen. 22:18). Our Lord Jesus Christ was born a Jew. Their presence to this day in society is a testimony that God's Word is true. Let us remember "Through your mercy they also may obtain mercy" (Rom. 10:1; 11).—Imogene Fridley, Mt. Morris, Ill.

LET'S READ MORE!

"MY BEST friend," Abraham Lincoln once said," is the man who can give me a book I have not read." Books were a rare and treasured possession in Lincoln's day. Today they are available by the hundreds. This fact should in no wise blind us to the serious, present-day situation of a population that reads far, far too little. Nor should the paradox of so many near-illiterate people in this land of abundant reading material be ignored.

Reading is one of life's most rewarding joys. The more we read the more we learn of the finest attainments of the great. The more we read the more we understand of all of the needs of mankind. The more we become interested in the lives of our neighbors around the world, the closer they will be brought into the focus of our spiritual sight.

To help correct this negligence of good reading habits we can be responsible for the discipline of our own twenty-four-hour days, by which we will find time to read more. In that decision we may help others to do the same.

In urging people to enlarge their reading programs we recognize the tremendous impact of modern, time-wasting entertainments offered to our generation. To counteract this flood of mediocre attractions, admittedly sprinkled here and there with some few fine things, the challenge comes to all age groups to develop discrimination of desire in cultural things. In this challenge we should turn to books more often.

In turning to the field of literature we are again confronted with the necessity of selection. There is a mountain of trash available, but it makes little noise and will lie quietly neglected if we turn to the best that has been written. In seeking the best that has been written we turn to authors of both the present and the past.

Librarians of school, public and state libraries are a wonderfully dedicated group and are helpful in bringing eager readers and good books together. Teachers and pastors, too, can find ways and means to bring a supply of books to a group of people desiring to spend more time in reading.

More time spent in reading gives the individual a greater appreciation of words. "Words," says Elizabeth Yates, "are bridges across which memory can travel, imagination can play and hope can reach." Words are indeed important to us. Their silent messages strike deeply into the cultural attitudes which each one of us consciously or unconsciously reveals.

In resolving to do more reading we should never consider that we are killing time. While reading is usually planned as an occupation for leisure hours, it can be a positive thing, providing new knowledge and new interests, and thus enriching our daily experiences and revelations.

Thinking individuals should encourage more intense reading courses because the freedom to read is one of the essentials of our democracy. Likewise, reading is one of the essentials of our spiritual growth. This is a quest which should include all age groups. It is a quest which should remain constant. Those who are steadfast in their purpose to enlarge their personalities by earnest reading will never be disappointed. To them will come adequate understanding of how they are related to all of life and its problems through the experiences of both the present and the past. Insight into the future will be fortified with greater spiritual confidence.

In urging adults to read more, the need is also present to convince them that children, too, should read more. The ability to read and to understand what they read is the inherent birthright of every child. To increase the reading program of the children is to lift them out of mediocrity. The more they read of well-selected books the better preparation they will have for meeting the complexities of living. They will also have received introductions to the sublime which will never be forgotten.

The parents who care will see that nothing takes away from their children the books they should read more and more. Munro Leaf, a discerning juvenile author of today, warns us not to leave our children to the "Handy-Dandy Pacifiers" of our time. Never before have we had so many "shutter-uppers," radio, television and movies.

Plan, then, to read more as a family. This plan increases the interest of the children. The thrill a family will receive from reading good books together will compensate for any sacrifice incurred in order to arrange a family reading hour. Strange to say, in an hour like this, children enjoy many adult books and adults enjoy the children's stories.

Especially is this true for those who resolve to do classic reading during the family hour. In this reading there will be the reward of greater wisdom for all. Breadth of view and an innate love of justice and truth will be encouraged as well as the unselfish point of view.

Keep books by the bedside. Then wakeful hours may be spent, not in worry, but in the replenishing of the mental storehouse. Keep books in the kitchen or in the office. There will be odd moments when a spiritual sandwich can be eaten to nourish the soul. Keep books by the television set. One day the tube may blow out and an advertent reader may be born.

It has been well said that every individual should be an authority on at least one subject. This ambition may well prove to be the lodestar in the decision to read more. Do read more—more of the lives of great people, more of travel, more of science, more of the classics, more sound fiction, more of inspiration and devotion, more of the Bible. More reading in your program of living will be a masterful stroke toward the assurance of a meaningful life.

THANKS FOR STRENGTH

MARTHA NEIDERHISER PARKER

I thank you, God, for my children;
For the privilege of sharing their childhood days,
The laughter and tears, the learning and growing,
For the help in teaching them Christlike ways.
Now, God, make me pliant and willing,
As this day pain-filled hours I see,
That Thy Spirit within me dwelling
May give me a childlike trust in Thee.

I thank you too, for my parents
Who built wisely a home on the Rock;
Who taught us by word and example,
And led as a shepherd his flock.
Make me wise and patient and loving,
With the children entrusted to me.
And when life's storms may rage about us
Christ will be our security.

Loving Father, there's no end to my blessings,
I never can count their worth.
Make as constant my faith in thy promise,
"Lo, I am with you to the end of the earth."
And, "Come to me, ye heavy burdened,
Needed rest I will give to thee,
And a peace that will pass understanding,
And a joy that the world cannot see."

"Blessed is he that readeth . . ."

Lift High the Cross

WHEN a new church was almost completed and only one task remained—to put a cross on the new steeple—a young minister volunteered for the job. His new mission took him heavenward in a chair that was hoisted by a derrick. From his precarious perch he placed the cross in position and polished it with his handkerchief. Later he said to his friends, "That's one thing they didn't teach me at the seminary."

No, not in so many words. But surely his seminary education must have encouraged him to "lift high the cross of Christ." Important as all other kinds of teaching may be for the minister, the central duty of his calling is to bear witness to the Christ of the cross. He may be a less than average speaker, he may be a poor fund-raiser, he may be weak in organization, he may have an unfortunate facility for tramping on important toes—but overcoming such natural handicaps is not what he needs most. It is rather a clear vision of what the cross, once it is lifted up, can do for the salvation of men and the transformation of society.—K.M.

It Isn't Easy

MANY of the popular discussions about prayer make it seem deceptively easy. It is a little like the recipe for worship that young people may get at a summer camp: Take a quiet hillside facing the sunset. Mix together a company of like-minded youth. Arrange for a violin playing in the distance. Plan for antiphonal singing. Read some great poetry from the Bible and the nature poets. Close with silent meditation. In such a setting who could keep from worshiping? The trouble is that teen-agers go back to city streets, rainy days, disinterested companions, noisy homes and a busy schedule. They could pray at camp. They fail to pray at home.

Of course, we welcome every aid to worship that a summer camp or a lovely church sanctuary offers. But somewhere in our growth in prayer we need to learn that communion with God can be realized without a background of organ music, stained glass windows, responsive readings or the company of sympathetic friends. Jesus undoubtedly enjoyed the quiet of lonely places for prayer, and he valued the association of his friends. But they failed him when he most urgently needed them. They slept during his prayer in Gethsemane. No orchestral music drifted from behind trees, no poetry was chanted while he sweat drops of blood in the anguish of those moments. Yet when was prayer ever more vital or worship more real?

Talk to parents who have waited through the long night to learn whether their child would live or die. Ask them if they heard organ music while they prayed. Perhaps they felt only the numbness of grief and the aching of sorrow as they prayed to God, yet in their lonely watching they knew that God was there. In the hours when hard decisions must be made a stained glass window will help but little and life may be colored a dull gray. But in such moments, chilled as they are by realities almost too cold to face, the Christian need not lose his grip on God. And he knows that Jesus was likewise tempted, that Paul learned to live with his thorn in the flesh, that prayer is no magic formula for erasing problems but the means of living up to them.

The life of prayer may be anything but placid. It includes some wrestling matches like Jacob's at Jabbok's ford. It requires some shattering moments of self-examination as when David lay all night upon the earth, sorrowing for his dying child and crying out, "I have sinned against the Lord." It is closer to the anxious questions of Job than to the easy answers of his friends.

The popular brands of easy prayer, complete with steps one, two and three and a guaranteed result, are inadequate for the kind of Christianity we need today. We do not want a religion that provides an escape from real life, but a religion of power that will transform life.—K.M.

Bridging the Gap

IN TALKING about bringing the district organization and the people in the local church closer together the speaker used as an illustration the old arc light which remained dark until a spark bridged the gap between the two poles.

How do we bridge the gap between individuals, between organizations, between nations? Two persons meet, they discover some mutual friend, like interests, common service in any organization. It may be that they have gone through some moments of danger together. Whatever it is, the gap is bridged and there is warmth of fellowship.

When the language and culture are different it is more difficult to find the spark that will flow from person to person. However, there is One who will help us bridge all gaps and with him as the spark we can become the light of the world.—E.W.

THE DIGNITY OF WORKING

J. Stanley Earhart

LABOR, toil, work—these have been the lot of man since very early days. In Gen. 3:19, God said, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground." This principle of toil applies as much to us in this day as it did to the first man to whom it was spoken.

The amount of energy expended for constructive labor in even one day cannot be measured. However, a nation such as ours, with its large, solidly constructed cities and its prosperous, well-kept countrysides, stands as a monument to hard work, long hours and endless toil.

Most of the Brethren have come from a hard-working background. The German people, both in this land and in Europe, have always been known for hard work, thrift, careful attention to their lands and homes and, as a result, for their prosperity. We may ever be thankful that this is our heritage—that we have an interest in work and possess the ability to channel our efforts into usefulness. We may thank God for the training and opportunity to work as we were growing up. There may have been times when we thought our youthful days were too much cluttered with things to do. We know now that every load of hay, every row of corn and every bucket of milk were good disciplines and that the ability to concentrate upon the tasks at hand was developed in the days of work in the home or on the farm.

Religious News Service

To be able to work with vigor and zeal, to see tasks needing to be done and then to do them—this is to achieve the greatest dignity in the sight of God and of man that is possible.

What motivations do we have for working? Here are three:

God is a worker. He has had and still has a definite work to do. The work of God may be divided into two parts: the creative and the redemptive. The work of creation was done in six days. This is a word picture of God, toiling at making the wonderful world in which we live and placing upon it all manner of living things, then stepping back from it all and seeing that it was good and then resting from his work. But that was not the end of the creative work of God. It has continued. Each day is actually a new creation. Each time a flower opens, each time a child is born, each time a new season comes, God's work as creator and sustainer is going on and on.

The redemptive work of God is equally wonderful. Because man failed to live up to the high ambitions God had for him, it has been necessary to devise ways and means whereby man could be brought back into the fellowship of the Father. This has been a work which was begun in those early days, and which has continued until this day. Everytime a person hears the call of God's spirit, every time a man or woman, boy or girl is born into the kingdom, the redemptive work of God continues.

God has ordained that man should work and has given laws regulating it. One of the first laws concerning man, as expressed in the Ten Commandments, is related to work. "Remember the Sabbath day and keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work" (Ex. 20:8-9).

Other regulations placed upon man were intended to keep him from spending his time doing things which would not be constructive. God knew that man would be able to make things with his hands and that he might be tempted to take a piece of clay, mold it into a figure and then begin to worship it instead of the true God. He warned again and again against idolatry. Being busy all the time doing things constructive and fruitful would be a good preventive against sin and keep men from forgetting God. In Deut. 6:10-15, we hear God's warnings to the people, reminding them that idleness in the new, but already developed land would provide a possibility of waywardness and idolatry. So we know that God is concerned about us, that the work we do should be for our own good and that it should never be detrimental or harmful.

God's Son, Jesus Christ, came to do the work of the Father and to help us to work for him. At the age of twelve, Jesus said, "I must be about my Father's business." When at last he was ready to begin his active ministry, he referred to it as the work for which he had come into the world. "I am come," he said, "to do the will of my Father." Jesus apparently left the manual toil of a Nazareth carpenter shop to become a traveling preacher. One was an earthly task in which he busied himself until his time came to take over the eternal tasks for which he had been sent into the world. But when he said, "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest" (Matt. 11:28), we may be sure that the invitation was for those who knew the weariness and fatigue of manual labor as well as for those whose lives were burdened down with sin.

We remember that when Jesus hung on the cross, he said, "It is finished." He meant that the work of salvation through the grace of God had been accomplished and that it was no longer needful for mankind to offer sacrifices for sin, but to be saved through faith. During his lifetime, Jesus said, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do; because I go unto my Father."

Knowing that God is a worker, that he intends that we should work, and realizing that Christ has come to help us understand how to work in the kingdom, we might ask, "When does our work assume proper dignity?"

We will experience the dignity when we remember God's laws as we engage in it. God gave other laws than those pertaining to the Sabbath day. The Scripture teaches against defrauding, against violating the property rights of another, against stealing and many others. If we remember in everything we do to respect and abide by the laws which God has given, our world will be a happier, better place in which to live.

Again, our work has dignity when we recognize and respect our fellow men in all we do.

Plowing a furrow is just as honorable as performing an operation

Religious News Service

Each time a flower opens, each time a child is born, each time a new season comes God's work as creator and sustainer goes on

Much has been said and written about the tensions between labor and management, particularly in the past generation. It is certain that if both employer and employee would abide by the golden rule, there would be few problems. Be the kind of an employer you would like to have if you had to work for someone else. Be the kind of a worker you would like to have if you were hiring people to work for you. We need also to respect our fellow workmen. We need to be sure that we are carrying our share of the responsibility. There are many jobs in which two persons are needed to perform the operation, but in which one may have to do ninety-five per cent of the work. A crosscut saw in the woods is a good example of this.

Let us always examine our work to discover whether in it and through it we are being beneficial to other people. There are some types of work which do not contribute to the welfare, the safety, the comfort and the improvement of people. Anything that drains the physical resources and strength of another is not according to God's will.

Finally, our work will have dignity if we recognize ourselves as stewards with responsibility. In our hands and in our heads, God has placed ability. We need to find our highest usefulness in the plan of God. There is every bit as much dignity in digging a ditch as there is in preaching a sermon. It is just as honorable to be able to plow a furrow as it is to perform a delicate operation. It is just as much of an art to bake a pie and make a dress as it is to be a musical performer or a painter. Any task done, with complete application, with proper humility and with pure motives is a dignified task.

The motto which guided the pioneer Brethren printers, "For the Glory of God and my Neighbor's Good," might well be adopted by all of us. If we have dedicated our lives to God through Jesus Christ, then we will look on everything we do as a continuing symbol of that dedication. Not only our worship and devotion, but the work of our hands will be a part of our religious expression.

A cobbler was once asked what his business was. "My business," he said, "is serving the Lord. I repair shoes to pay my expenses." What a wonderful change would come about in the world if every Christian would realize that his chief business is to serve the Lord and that his daily work was intended to pay expenses. God helping us, may we make this resolution!

Words That Have Acquired Better Meanings

Luther A. Weigle

SOME words that were used by the King James Version in a bad sense have now acquired less evil meanings or even good connotations. Debate is now a decorous word, with no suggestion of bad temper or violent disorder, yet Paul lists debate along with envy, murder, deceit and malignity among the characteristics of the reprobate mind in the King James Version of Rom. 1:29. It stands there as a translation of the Greek word eris, which means "strife." In Greek legend Eris was the name of the goddess of strife, who threw the golden apple which awakened the jealousy of Hera, Athene and Aphrodite, and in the end brought on the Trojan War. Isa. 58:4 reads: "Ye fast for strife and debate, and to smite with the fist of wickedness." In the second part of Shakespeare's King Henry IV (IV, 4, 2), the king refers to Northumberland's insurrection as

"This debate that bleedeth at our doors."

The two occurrences of the word emulation are different in tone. In Rom. 11:14 Paul writes of stirring his fellow-Jews to emulation of the Gentiles; but in Gal. 5:20 "emulations" are included with adultery, idolatry, murder, drunkenness and a spate of similar evils in a long list of the works of the flesh as contrasted with the fruit of the Spirit.

In 1611 the words delicacy, delicately, and deliciously referred at best to luxurious living, and two of them are used in Revelation for wanton licentiousness (18:3, 7, 9). To be "high-minded" was to be proud or haughty (Rom. 11:20; 1 Tim. 6:17; 2 Tim. 3:4); the term is used now for noble character and high principles.

The Music Is Persistent

THE music is so persistent that reading the New Testament is like being in a bird sanctuary on a spring morning, it has been said. It is a book of sorrows but it is a song of jubilation. The early Christians had more than their share of troubles. Their faith and habits of life made them seem queer; they were suspected and feared and intermittently were persecuted. Most of them were poor in this world's goods and few were the earthly honors heaped on them. For the most part they were simple folk, not burdened with learning and not spoiled by luxuries. They shared the common lot of all—grief and bereavement and frustration.

Their joy poured forth from relationships, they were obedient to the heavenly vision, they thrilled at the thought of the nearness of their living Lord, and of them it was said, Behold, how these Christians love one another. They had found in their own experience that nothing could separate them from the love of God, absolutely nothing. They were enraptured by hope, the lively expectation of the imminent return of Christ in the body and the anticipation of endless life in the age to come.

They remembered the words of the Lord, "Fear not, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." They lived by the promise, "These things have I spoken to you that my joy may be in you and that your joy may be full."

They had learned in whatever state they were to be content, through his power which was sufficient for all their needs. They assured one another, "May you be strengthened with all power, according to his glorious might, for all endurance and patience with joy, giving thanks to the Father, who has qualified us to share in the inheritance of the saints in light, and has delivered us from the dominion of darkness and transferred us to the kingdom of his beloved son."

Naughtiness is really bad in the King James Version; it means downright wickedness. The injunction in James 1:21 to "lay apart all filthiness and superfluity of naughtiness" now reads: "put away all filthiness and rank growth of wickedness." The terms naughty and naughtiness have lost some of their evil through the years; they are now used for the misdeeds of children or the trivial misbehavior of adults who have not matured. The "naughty figs" that Jeremiah saw in his vision (24:2) were simply "bad figs," so bad that they could not be eaten.

Chained Bibles

George W. Wright

THE Book which is today the best seller has a most interesting life history. Men of many generations and with a wide variety of culture wrote books and manuscripts describing how God had inspired them with certain messages. Prophets and kings, shepherds and publicans, fishermen and evangelists combined their writings to help us to understand the great Creator and his son, our redeemer. Far and wide has the Bible been translated so that men and women of all races and nationalities have been blessed as they read, believed and obeyed its teachings.

This Book of all books has not always enjoyed favorable acceptance. For a long period of time it was a chained book. Men were threatened with death if they even dared to peer into its sacred pages. Swords were heated a fiery red and held so close to the eyes of some who dared that they were blinded. Others had hands severed at the wrists because they courageously opened the Book. Still others were burned at the stake. Surely the Bible was a chained book in those days.

Today the Bible is sold everywhere and some copies are available at as low a cost as the purchase of a sandwich or even a glass of milk. And yet to some folks it is still a "chained book." It is chained not because it is illegal to read it or because of the penalty of death, but because the individual chooses to chain it. It is a chained Bible when it is not read.

The Bible is a way of life and is only effective as its teachings become our practice. We chain the Bible when we neglect to read it, feeling that we can get along without it. Have you ever become lost in strange territory simply because you did not consult or follow the road map? The Bible is God's road map for the journey of life leading to an eternal goal. We only cheat ourselves when we think it is not important that we know the way. The Bible points out not only the right way but also warns of dangers into which we might fall.

The Book of books is also chained when we become so busy with the many activities of life that there is no time left to read the greatest of all books. Paul suggests that we put "first things first," and surely a knowledge of life's purpose and goal is most important. The Bible reveals the way to the abundant life and there is always the danger of becoming so involved in "things" that we fail to reach and enjoy many blessings that are intended for us.

So let us break the chains from our personal Bibles and not only read but apply its teachings to our lives and enjoy real Christian living.

The Family Counselor

Naomi Will H. K. Zeller, Jr. Jesse Ziegler

The Family Counselor welcomes letters of inquiry. They may be addressed: Family Life Department, General Brotherhood Board, 22 S. State St., Elgin, Ill.

Dear Counselor,

I have a concern which has been bothering me increasingly of late. My husband does not seem interested in our children and neglects them seriously from my point of view. He is very loving and thoughtful of me, is a hard worker and a good provider. I believe that he loves the children too, but pays so little attention to them.

When I mentioned it to him one day, he said that was my job. He said he didn't know what to do with them. He doesn't even want me to call him, "Daddy," but says I should call him by his name as he is not my father. When he is working in the basement at his carpentry hobby, he doesn't seem to want our young son with him.

I suppose I should feel flattered at his attentions to me, but I am concerned about the effect of his attitude on his and the children's larger happiness.

Concerned Mother.

Dear Friend,

I can understand your concern about your husband's neglect of his children. Many fathers feel it to be the mother's job to care for and train the children while authorities on family relations and child training are pointing out with ever-increasing force the importance of the father's love, understanding and cooperation in the family circle. Some go so far as to say that the delinquency we all deplore is due as much if not more to the lack of helpful participation on the part of the father in the life of the family as to the mother's working.

However, I feel we are gradually waking up to this fact. Many of our young married people who have had the opportunity of training in our youth groups, camps and colleges are doing such a good job as husbands and fathers as well as wives and mothers. It is becoming increasingly the accepted pattern for the father to share in the care and enjoyment of the babies and growing children and to help in developing the skills of their sons and daughters.

In line with this view we feel our child study groups in our churches should be parents' study groups rather than mothers' study groups. Father very much needs to be there too. I feel it would be helpful if, at the invitation of some of the other young fathers, your husband could be persuaded to attend a parents' group in your church fellowship.

Some good books for him to read if you can bring it about are Babies Need Fathers Too, by Kellogg, and Fathers are Parents Too, by English and Foster.

Let me add for your encouragement it may be your husband will become more interested in the children as they grow older. Since he says he doesn't know what to do with them, he may feel ill at ease around small children as some men do. I would urge you to be patient with him and not try to force his interest. His love for you and general concern for his family are wholesome. His interest in the children as individuals will probably develop with the years.

A Christian Classic

for Children and Their Parents

Professor Mook
presents new details about Anna Sewell,
the author of one of the most popular books in the English-speaking world,
Black Beauty

Maurice A. Mook

IT MAY surprise some to learn that what is sometimes said to be the most popular book in the English-speaking world, excepting only the Bible itself, was written not only as a story to be enjoyed, but also as a Christian tract. Its author and her mother, who was also a writer, believed that the purpose of their writing should be that of "inculcating moral virtues in all relations of life."

Historians of best sellers estimate that several million copies of Black Beauty by Anna Sewell have been sold. It is currently in print and for sale in more than thirty-five "editions" by at least twenty-five English and American publishers. It has also been translated into several foreign languages. It has been read with avidity since its publication in 1877. Its author, however, has been all but forgotten.

A biography of Anna Sewell has never been written, so that it has been necessary to build the following story of her life largely from the published biography of her mother. An author for children and teen-agers should rescue her story from oblivion, for her life is an instructive and inspiring example of quiet Christian living. Also from the standpoint of her influence she deserves a full-fledged biography, for she may be fairly judged to have been more influential than most writers of the past century. All we need to assume is that her book has been to some degree effective in molding the minds of its millions of readers.

Anna Sewell was born at Yarmouth, England, March 30, 1820, and died near Norwich, April 25, 1878. These facts, along with the title of her only published book and the statement that it has always been a favorite with children and often with their parents, are about all one can gather from standard biographical sources, many of which do not mention her at all. Her book goes unnoticed in most histories of literature. It may have its limitations as "literature" but it is clearly the sort of story which "holds children from play and old men from chimney corners."

Anna Sewell was the first child and only daughter born to Isaac and Mary Wright Sewell, both of whom were English Quakers. Her parents were what Quakers call "birthright Friends," for both families had been affiliated for several generations with the Society of Friends.

Her own life was typical of nineteenth century "Quietistic" Quakers in its external uneventfulness and social semi-isolation, the latter in her case having been emphasized by an accident in childhood which crippled her for life. The world of this "compassionate invalid" then became largely confined, as she said, to her "house and sofa." This seclusion was fortunately occasionally interrupted by visits to her home paid by friends of the family and especially by the children of the neighborhood, in whom both she and her mother were always much interested.

Her book was written during the final years of her illness, a period during which she was often the victim of almost unbearable pain. "I am poorly" and "I am quite poorly with pain" are, however, the strongest statements of her suffering to be found in her diary. Her mother, who wrote verses and stories for children, copied her daughter's manuscript, which was sold to a publisher, outright and with no provision for royalties, for twenty pounds (less than $100). Call We Them Common?

ODA MITCHEL BOYER

There are many common blessings
Around us all the while—
The sweet fresh air, the falling rain,
The sun ray's cheery smile,
The robin's song at break of day,
The dew be-sparkled grass,
The fragrance of a new blown rose,
That waits us as we pass,
Kind friends who greet us every day,
Who love us and who care,
And work to do in pleasant homes,
For loved ones sheltered there.

Why should we call these common things,
That come in daily store?
For he who finds in them true joy,
Finds riches at his door.

Black Beauty went to a fifth printing within a year of its publication, its author died within a few months of its first appearance, thus not living to realize its full popularity or the powerful influence it was to have after coming from the press. It is the kind of book parents read to their younger children and which often all of the children of a family later read for themselves. Thus it has undoubtedly had a much wider circulation and influence than even its phenomenal sales figures indicate.

Anna Sewell's parents were not financially well favored. Her father was unfortunate in a series of business enterprises and moved his family from place to place as he pursued various undertakings to support his household. Her mother was remarkably resourceful in these circumstances, at one time selling family possessions to provide household necessities. Later, at the age of sixty, she turned to writing "simple descriptive poetry," as she called it, for the instruction of children and the edification of poor people. The latter's tastes, she felt, did not equal those of better-educated adult readers. Her "stories in verse in words of one syllable" attained an unusual popularity for their day. Her Mother's Last Words, which appeared in 1860, went to over one million copies, and her Our Father's Care, which came out the next year, sold over seven hundred thousand.

These and numerous other titles, appeared before it ever occurred to Anna Sewell to emulate her mother in writing. After Anna also began to write, she and her mother grew to regard each other as their own best critics. Mary Sewell once stated that "if I can pass my Nannie, I don't fear (my) world (of readers) after that." Her confidence in her daughter's judgment seems to have been well taken, for the sales success of both mother and daughter, as one commentator has remarked, "must not have little perplexed" their more eminent but less popular literary contemporaries.

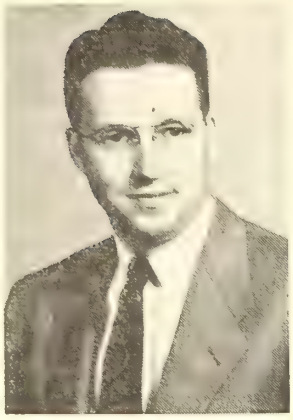
Long before they came to share mutual interests in writing Mary and Anna Sewell were very close to each other, Mary never permitting anything to interfere with her merciful oversight of Anna, especially in the latter's last years. Visitors to the home in the 1870's speak of Anna writing while lying on the sofa and passing her pages to her mother who copied them in more legible longhand for the printer. Mary also is said to have massaged Anna's painful ankles with one hand, while holding copy in the other as they discussed each other's work. Under such circumstances, it is not surprising that some sentimentality got into the writings of both. Both authors wrote with simplicity, directness, matter-of-factness and moralistic force. One's were sermons in verse, the other's in prose.

In spite of the understanding and considerate mother-daughter relationship, the family life was invaded intermittently by crises and at one time by spiritual uneasiness. Mary Sewell had a period of religious difficulty, from which she is said to have emerged by being baptized and becoming a member of the Church of England. She joined in 1835, when Anna was fifteen years old, and it is possible that Anna likewise became at least temporarily a communicant.

In spite of Mary Sewell's deflection from Quakerism the use of Quaker "plain speech" persisted in the home, a practice which is reported and quoted by Mary Sewell's biographer for the 1860's and 1870's. Anna Sewell even spoke in the "plain" language to animals. Her father died but a few months after the death of his daughter in 1878. They were buried beside each other in a Quaker burying ground near Buxton, Norfolk. Mary Sewell lived six years longer and was also buried in the same cemetery.

Anna Sewell's love of and interest in the welfare of animals was a lifelong concern. Her mother tells how, when Anna was a small child, a man shot a bird, which fell into the family garden. The man came to the gate, but was met by the child who cried, "No! thee cruel man, thee shan't have it at all!" She and her mother later developed an enthusiastic interest in natural history. They would capture butterflies long enough to observe and draw them, but would then release them, for they could never bring themselves to "compass death to make a collection" of specimens.

Black Beauty is, of course, a polemic against the use of whips, cruel bits, check reins and all other instruments and methods of mistreating horses. Anna Sewell's own method of driving is of interest in this connection. A family friend once wrote that she "seemed simply to hold the reins in her hand, trusting to her voice to give all needed directions." Her friendly remonstrances were in the Quaker plain speech of the period: "Now thee must go a little faster (to her pony); thee would be sorry for us to be late at the station."



Her kindness to animals is seen even at her funeral. As she was being taken to her final resting place her mother noticed that the horses in the procession had their heads held high with check reins. "Nannie would never approve!" her mother exclaimed, and had all reins loosened before she would permit the carriages to proceed.

Some critics have disparagingly referred to Black Beauty as "propaganda for a horse." Anna Sewell herself called it her effort "to bring the thoughts of men in harmony with the purposes of God" in the

THE Lord mapped out his work: "You shall be my witnesses in Jerusalem and in all Judea and Samaria and to the end of the earth." In obedience to this command the disciples first filled Jerusalem with the fact of Christ's resurrection. They extended the "good news" to Judea and Samaria. And as followers of "the way" were scattered by persecution, the gospel was witnessed at distant points. Everywhere renewed personalities, transformed by the power of the Spirit, were evangelists because they were actually witnesses.

Basic to a witness then as today were such elements as corporate worship, a redemptive fellowship and the commitment of all of life's resources to God. These are attained through the Christian church, the body of Christ's believers bound together irrevocably by love.

Does this map for evangelism at home, in the state and country and throughout the world have merit in our age? Do the factors which contributed so immensely to the growth of the early church—the transformed personalities, warm fellowship, group worship and total-life commitment—suggest a workable pattern for capturing modern-day individuals and communities for Christ?

Five Church of the Brethren pastors, among a hundred serving at home mission points throughout the five regions of the Brotherhood, reply to this query, "Indeed." For each has been instrumental in the development of a new or revitalized church along such a pattern.

Of major importance in the growth of the new churches have been the pastors themselves. Like the early disciples, they are renewed and committed personalities, inspiring and leading congregations to know and do God's will. From their transforming efforts come new Christians and new churches.

Believing in these men, the General Brotherhood Board invests $90,000 in their work yearly through 90 supplemental pastoral allowances. The local churches each year carry a larger share of pastoral support. Brotherhood Board gift grants and loans, too, in the amount of $206,000 annually help such church developments as these become a reality.

Drexel Hill: Lay Evangelism

Home mission boards in Pennsylvania are aggressive in looking for new areas for churches. Twenty-five projects are now under way in the Eastern Region, several involving gift grants and supplemental pastoral aid from the Brotherhood Board.

Drexel Hill, the sixth Church of the Brethren in the Philadelphia area, first convened as a monthly meeting in the home of Dr. and Mrs. Galen S. Young. From the fellowship group of eight in 1950 and thirty-five in 1952, the church now has a membership of ninety-nine and an average attendance of one hundred and four. On a recent Sunday, attendance reached 145.

A survey had found the mushrooming Chester-Media-Swarthmore areas fertile for an organized church. In May 1953 the purchase of the Drexel Hill Baptist church and parsonage for $50,000, plus furnishings, answered the need for a building.

Financial backing included a $15,000 grant and $1,500 yearly pastoral salary assistance from the Brotherhood, plus much help from the North Atlantic District and from neighboring churches.

Donald H. Shank, a former businessman before entering ministerial training, came as pastor to Drexel

Hill following graduation at Bethany Seminary in May 1953. Following door-to-door surveys, intensive visitation was organized. More recently fellowship evangelism has been used. "One of the great values of this is that when you 'take them in the front door they don't go out the back,'" Bro. Shank states. Both evangelistic approaches rest largely upon lay members' participation.

Dr. Young, now moderator, speaks of the happenings at Drexel Hill: "Our prayers are being answered in God's own appointed time. We shall be careful to give God the honor and glory for the acquisition of another Church of the Brethren."

An estimated $23,500 worth of volunteer labor was donated for the Covington, Wash. church. The chancel, including pulpit, lectern and altar, is of brick artistry

Pulaski: a Financial Canvass

The First church at Pulaski, Va., had its beginnings in 1909. The struggles over the years have been so intense that at times there was little hope for survival, according to one member of the congregation. When Glenn S. Garner, a new graduate of Bethany Seminary, became pastor in 1950, both he and the church realized that progress must be made toward a new building.

Full backing came from the Southern District of Virginia, the Southeastern Region and the General Brotherhood Board. The district promised $1,000 annually for pastoral support for five years, and the Brotherhood Board, a $15,000 gift grant. A new site and new building would cost $75,000. Could the Pulaski members give sufficiently to build?

There had been difficulty in securing for the building fund $2,000 annually above a $5,000 budget. A previous canvass was not proving successful. But through a professionally-conducted canvass, $45,205 was pledged over a period of 150 weeks for the building fund and budget. "The figures are illuminating since the economic conditions of Pulaski are static and many employees are laid off," the pastor asserts.

A member who had not been inside the church for twenty-one years attended the loyalty dinner of the canvass. "This financial drive has set our congregation alive," states Pastor Garner. "Many of us still say what has happened is too good to be true; yet we know it is true when we see almost $300 being given in our weekly offerings. A unity of purpose and spirit is evident now."

Brother Garner adds, "Our people pray for the day when we can begin to pass help through the district, region and Brotherhood to others who stand in need of it. Without this help the Pulaski church would not be alive today."

Springfield: State Strategy

Missouri, comprised of three districts whose separate memberships are less than that of some Brethren congregations, has adopted the strategy of state-wide co-operation for the development of mission congregations. The three directors of district missions, Eugene Gnagy, Plattsburg; D. Eugene Lichty, Mountain Grove; and Warren Shoemaker, now of Springfield, and the state fieldman, Ralph Skaggs, Warrensburg, were named as a representative state strategy committee. The Northern, Middle and Southern districts passed the committee's recommendation last December that Springfield become the site of their first joint mission effort.

Monthly fellowship meetings had been commenced for Springfield Brethren two years earlier by D. Eugene Lichty, a district director of missions. In January 1954 representatives from the Southern and Middle districts visited in Springfield and found much interest in a future church.

Subsequent meetings and surveys directed activities to Wedgewood, in the southwestern part of the city. With the aid of the General Brotherhood Board for the pastor's support, the district board of Southern Missouri and the Springfield Brethren called the W. Warren Shoemaker family to the new pastorate this fall.

Two months ago a new parsonage chapel was dedicated at Springfield, also the result of tri-district co-operation. Average attendance during the summer was twenty-three, ten of whom were adults. Offerings average between four and five dollars weekly per adult.

"In its beginning phase," comments Pastor Shoemaker, "the fellowship seeks to conserve and strengthen the Brethren within our midst. However, this is only part of the task. Located in a growing area of the city, our task includes a community. Surveys and plans for expanded work and visitation evangelism are being laid."

Mr. and Mrs. A. O. Cook visit prospective members in a stewardship education program of Detroit's third church, Bethany

Bethany: Third Since 1950

Five years ago the city of Detroit had but one Church of the Brethren. Today, through a series of carefully planned developments, three growing Brethren churches are implanted in strategic areas of the Motor City.

The older body, First church, has moved nearer its membership in the northeast section of the city while the new Trinity church has been established on the west side. According to Galen T. Lehman, Central Region executive secretary it is common for each group to have as many or more present on Sunday as there was at the one church five years ago.

Following surveys by Brethren Matthew Myer and Robert McFadden, under sponsorship of the Ministry and Home Mission Commission of the Brotherhood Board, the decision was made to locate the third church, to be known as the Bethany congregation, in northwest Detroit. In the summer of 1954 fellowship meetings were started and in May of this year, regular worship services.

With help from the Michigan District and from the Brotherhood, a location with comity approval of the Detroit Council of Churches has been purchased for Bethany church. A church building outgrown by another denomination has become the temporary quarters.

William Kidwell, former BVS'er and a 1955 graduate of Bethany Seminary, is pastor of the new church. Though the First and Trinity churches are heavily in debt for new structures, they have given financial backing and a nucleus of the twenty-nine charter members to Bethany church. Additional prospective families have been visited by laymen in a stewardship education canvass. Attendance is averaging fifty, while offerings through four summer months amounted to $1,940.

What are the goals for this infant church? Bro. Kidwell lists these: A new church building in two years; a doubling of membership the first year; every member an active church worker; cultivation of unchurched people in a one-mile radius of the permanent site; every member a tither; and vital community relations.

Covington: Sunday-school Origin

At Covington, Washington, about thirty miles southeast of Seattle, a Sunday school was opened by the American Sunday School Union under Brethren leadership in the early 1940's. Bernhard H. Suttle and his wife drove seventy miles weekly to take charge of the mission point under sponsorship of the Seattle church.

Clement Bontrager, the present pastor, assumed part-time leadership in 1947. A chicken house on the Bontrager property became a church annex, but soon this and other accommodations in homes proved inadequate. Today a $100,000 edifice stands nestled among evergreens on a site in front of a forest. From the first log-sawing project on New Year's Day, 1952, till after the dedication on Palm Sunday, 1953, volunteer labor—an estimated $23,500 worth—has been donated by members, neighbors, other Brethren churches and two BVS'ers. "Somehow the Lord seems to have taken our dedicated ignorance, ability and all and turned it to good account," Bro. Bontrager relates.

"About $600 to $1,300 came in every quarter for a while for the building fund," the pastor indicated. "Some thought the pledges that were made would not be safe. As it is working out, practically every pledge will be paid." The Washington District and Pacific Coast Region gave assistance. The Brotherhood, in addition to pastoral support aid, gave a $15,000 building grant and a $5,000 loan. The latter was returned by the Covington congregation when they saw they could get along without it.

Forrest U. Groff, Brotherhood building counselor, drew the church plans. Unique in its modified English Gothic style is the chancel ensemble, including pulpit, lectern and altar, of brick pumice.

"We built for the community and the people in it," the pastor adds. "We tried to build a church building that reflects the glory and beauty of God, as well as his strength."

* * * *

These are but part of the evangelistic and church building endeavors of the Brotherhood's Ministry and Home Mission Commission. More than a score of future developments like these, needing help to help themselves, await assistance from the financial and personal resources of the church at large.

Much could be said also of the Christian education, worship, community witness and other facets in the lives of these mission churches. In all of them dedicated and consecrated laymen have played key roles in the dramatic occurrences. Avows Bro. Shank, pastor at Drexel Hill: "A church is only as good as its laymen—men and women who are willing and ready to make sacrifices whatever they may be; men and women who are truly seeking first the kingdom of God." But leadership must be made available to inspire and direct the wealth of lay potential.

Spreading out in your community, in your state, in your country, in your world can be the Christian church and the Christian faith. The General Brotherhood Board will help with leadership and funds as it is able.

Reviews of Recent Books

Better Leaders for Your Church. Weldon Crossland. Abingdon, 1955. 128 pages. $2.00.

Here is a practical manual on how to find, enlist, train and lead workers in the local church. Those who follow the suggestions in this book will in most cases discover a wealth of leadership material they did not know they had. This book will help you get away from the haphazard hit and miss system that is in vogue in so many churches. It will also show you how to spread out the work. The chapter on How to Guide Twenty-Two Important Committees is a helpful job analysis that will be much appreciated by many of your workers. The actual sample of an enlistment interview will be worth the price of the book to many pastors and superintendents. Pastors will profit from the chapter, How to Sustain High Leadership Morals.

This book is important reading for pastors, church school superintendents and members of personnel and nominating committees—C. Ernest Davis.

Portrait of Calvin. T.H.L.Parker. Westminster Press, 1955. 124 pages. $2.00.

In his third book on Calvin, T. H. L. Parker distills the massive theological, literary and social contributions of the greatest leader of the reformed wing of the Reformation into a remarkably lifelike picture. His aim is not to present a full-scale biography, for that would require several volumes but rather to paint a portrait of Calvin, which will show "the unity of his life, . . . his thoughts, his actions, and his intention." In this the author has eminently succeeded. Here the brilliant reformer lives again in all his greatness as well as in his littleness: virtues and vices appear unvarnished. Here is Calvin in all his breadth as reformer, man of letters, theologian, family man, courageous minister, ecumenical churchman, and yet with his limitations seen in the burning of Servetus.—David J. Wieand, Lombard, Ill.

A Christian Classic

treatment of animals. John Woolman, the American antislavery leader, who was born a century to the year before Anna Sewell, would have approved, for it was part of his faith to believe that "where the love of God is verily perfected . . . a tenderness toward all creatures made subject to us will be experienced."

In the teaching of "tenderness toward creatures" Anna Sewell has probably succeeded more than any other writer ever has. For we may reasonably conclude that her book has had a tremendous total influence, assuming merely that in some measure it has successfully communicated its gospel of kindness to its readers.

To call it "one of the most successful animal stories ever written" is to give it but mild praise. A more generous and truer evaluation is by one of the few critics who have recognized the book as an event in the history of literature. He says that "in the history of humane literature its popularity is unique, and in the history of all literature it continues to maintain its place as an authentic classic."

It still well deserves to be read, both by young people and their parents—to be read not only for the sake of its story, but also for its effective presentation of the Christian teaching of tender consideration for and kind treatment of not only animals, but also of our fellow human beings. Anna Sewell would have agreed—would have most emphatically agreed—with Wordsworth, her contemporary, who said that

"That best portion of a good man's life (is)
His little, nameless, (even) unremembered acts
Of kindness and of love."

Bridgewater College

The college is issuing a Diamond Jubilee Certificate of appreciation as a post-seventy-fifth anniversary recognition of those individuals and organizations who have given one thousand dollars or more to the institution since the era of annual fund promotion starting around 1943-44. The preliminary list totals 130 certificates to be issued with the signatures of the president of the college, the president of the board of trustees and the president of the Alumni Association.

Enrollment for the fall term totals 477, an increase of 8% above the previous year. President Bowman reports that students with Church of the Brethren affiliation total 249. New freshmen number 163.

Dr. A. C. Flora, of Columbia, S. C., former president of the National Education Association, was on the campus Oct. 23-26 as a guest lecturer and consultant on the college teacher training program. Dr. Flora holds degrees from Daleville and Bridgewater. On Oct. 27 he spoke to the breakfast meeting in Richmond of Bridgewater alumni attending the Virginia Education Association Convention.

Guy Wampler, Jr., senior student from Bassett and president of the Brethren Student Christian Movement, is busy with his committees in preparation for the national conference which convenes on the Bridgewater campus over Thanksgiving vacation.

The trustees of the college will meet on Nov. 14 for their fall session. Elder I. C. Senger, chairman of the board, will seat three new members: from Mardela, Fred Fifer has been elected to succeed J. M. Bennett, both of Wyoming, Del.; from North Carolina, Holt Griffith of Relief, has been elected to succeed Robert A. Reed of Sparta; and from First Virginia, Orval Garber of Roanoke, succeeds R. Douglas Nininger of Salem.

Work is nearing completion on a new four-unit brick apartment house for faculty members which has been estimated to cost $40,000. Each unit will consist of four rooms and a bath. Representing an endowment investment, the addition of this building will meet a growing need for housing for single faculty members and young couples on the faculty.

Fred Swartz, sophomore preministerial student from Ft. Defiance, has recently returned from an executive committee meeting of the Southern Area of the Y. M. C. A. at Atlanta, Georgia. Swartz was elected at the Southern Regional Conference of the Student Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. at Blue Ridge, N. C., in the summer. His election to the nine-member executive committee is an unusual honor for a sophomore inasmuch as ten states and eighty-five campus Christian Associations comprise the movement.

A large number of alumni returned to the campus on Oct. 29 for home-coming. A football game with Hampden-Sydney College and a "Drama Festival" were featured. The Bridewater church co-operated with its own home-coming on Oct. 30 with Bro. Paul H. Bowman speaking in the morning and the college glee clubs rendering a hymn sing at night under the direction of Nelson T. Huffman.

Ten former Bridgewater students who are presently enrolled in Brethren Volunteer Service visited the campus for a week end in October from their base at New Windsor.

Churchman Urges Visits to Iron Curtain Countries

Dr. James E. Wagner, president of the Evangelical and Reformed church, said on his return from a ten-week tour of Europe that there are "great masses of people under the Communist regime who are not sympathetic to Communist ideals." Dr. Wagner, who spent six days of his European tour in Communist Hungary, said that he sympathized deeply with the position of many religious leaders there because "they have to walk a tightrope if they are not to incur greater restrictions."

National Council Board Defines Church-State Separation

The General Board of the National Council of Churches recently declared the separation of church and state does not imply that either should be indifferent to the interests of the other. The board also put the council on record as defending the rights and liberties of cultural, racial and religious minorities. It called on churches because of their concern for all human welfare to resist every threat to freedom. At the same time, the statement warned that the exercise of both rights and liberties is subject to considerations of morality and to the maintenance of public order and of individual and collective security.

The board also authorized its executive officers to testify at U.S. Senate hearings in behalf of liberalizing existing immigration laws. The board reaffirmed its policy statement adopted in 1952 which set forth the following principles: 1. Congress should make the quota system more flexible. 2. Congress should complete the process of amending immigration and naturalization laws so that, within the quota system, all discriminatory provisions based upon consideration of color, race, or sex would be removed. 3. Congress should establish a system of fair hearings and appeals respecting the issuance of visa and deportation proceedings.

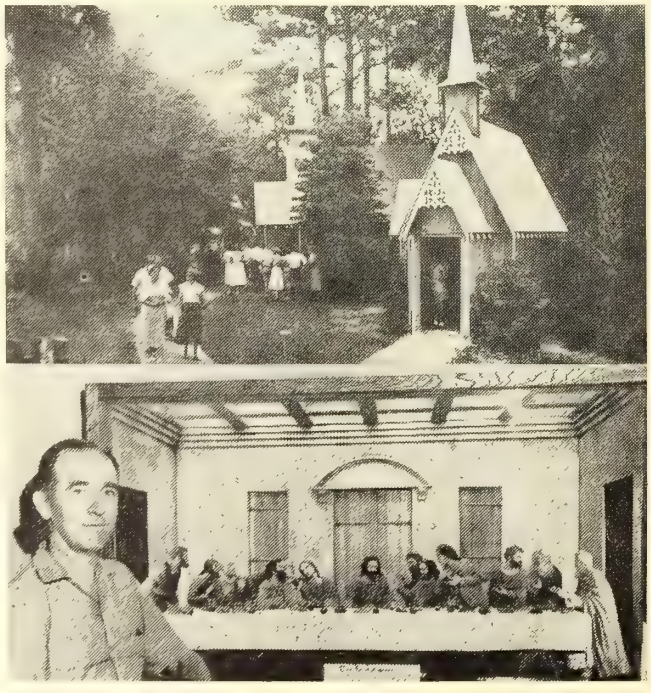
Theologian Retraces Journeys of St. Paul

Dr. William R. Cannon, dean of the Candler School of Theology at Emory University in Atlanta, Ga., has just completed a tour which retraced the journeys of St. Paul. He is believed to be the only person ever to have accomplished such an undertaking.

The theologian spent four summers in the Mediterranean countries, stopping at every place St. Paul visited that is mentioned in the New Testament. He traveled more than 70,000 miles and made about 3,600 color slides. His purpose was to gather material for three books which he expects to complete during the next five years. The theologian said that in many ways travel in the Near East is more difficult today than it was in St. Paul's time.

Turkish Rioters Damage Greek Orthodox Churches

Devastation of churches and church property in and near Istanbul was described as a very great tragedy by Raymond E. Maxwell. Rev. Maxwell investigated damages inflicted on churches, schools and homes in the violent demonstrations on the night of Sept. 6. He reports that mobs had visited destruction on churches, schools and cemeteries as well as thousands of shops, stores and homes. Property valued at over one hundred million dollars was destroyed and the very existence of thousands of persons was threatened. More than sixty out of a total of eighty Orthodox churches in and near Istanbul were either destroyed by mobs or their interiors so badly ruined as to render them completely unusable. Many churches were completely gutted by fire. Scriptures and service books, vestments, icons and religious pictures and church furnishings were torn, smashed, chopped to pieces or burnt.



Hoover Stresses High Cost of Crime

Crime costs the nation fourteen dollars for every dollar given to the churches, according to J. Edgar Hoover, director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. He told the International Association of Chiefs of Police that the cost of crime is almost twenty billion dollars annually.

The FBI chief said that the alarming situation with regard to juvenile theft might be quickly remedied if parents were held legally and financially responsible for the criminal acts of their children.

Disciples Gained 140,000 in Year of Evangelism

Membership in the Disciples of Christ increased by nearly 140,000 during its 1953-54 "Year of Evangelism." It was the denomination's most successful year of evangelistic activity. During the evangelism year, Sunday-school enrollment increased nine per cent. The Disciples, with more than 1,800,000 members in the U. S., are the largest Protestant denomination originating in this country.

Lord's Day Alliance Surveys Sunday Laws

A survey of the Sunday laws, now on the statute books of the forty-eight states, is currently being made by the Lord's Day Alliance. Letters were sent to the attorney generals of the states, asking them to furnish the Alliance with the laws of their commonwealth relating to Sunday. According to the Alliance leaders, communities in over twenty states are currently engaged in campaigns to close stores on Sunday and to return the Lord's Day to the church.

Indians to Mark Three Major Anniversaries

Protestants in India will celebrate three major anniversaries within the next twelve months. In October a three-month observance was launched to mark the fiftieth year of India's first indigenous missionary society. This is a nondenominational agency that evangelizes in areas not occupied by churches or foreign mission groups. In January Christians in South India will join Lutherans from over the world in marking the 250th anniversary of the arrival of the first Protestant missionaries in India. These were German Lutherans. Early next year Methodists in Southern Asia—some 123,000—will begin celebrating the 100th anniversary of their church which was started by American missionaries.

1957 Religious Census Up to Budget Bureau

It is up to the Bureau of the Budget in Washington to decide whether or not a census of religious bodies will be taken in 1957. The Census Bureau is prepared to ask Congress for $1,250,000 to conduct such a census. The last census of religious bodies was taken in 1937. A census scheduled for 1947 was abandoned upon orders of an economy-minded Congress. If a 1957 census is authorized it will be a census of religious bodies and not of individuals. Information will be obtained through contacts with local churches.

German Communists Developing Pseudo-Religious Ceremonies

East German Communists are developing ceremonies to take the place of Christian baptism, marriage and funeral rites. Last year youth dedication ceremonies were launched in the Soviet Zone as a Communist counterpart of Christian confirmation and first communion rites. Church observers in East Germany say it is obvious the Communists are trying to create a pseudo-religious cult to advance their ideology. The new rites they have announced include name-giving ceremonies, ceremonies for newly-weds and speeches by Communist functionaries in the case of funerals.

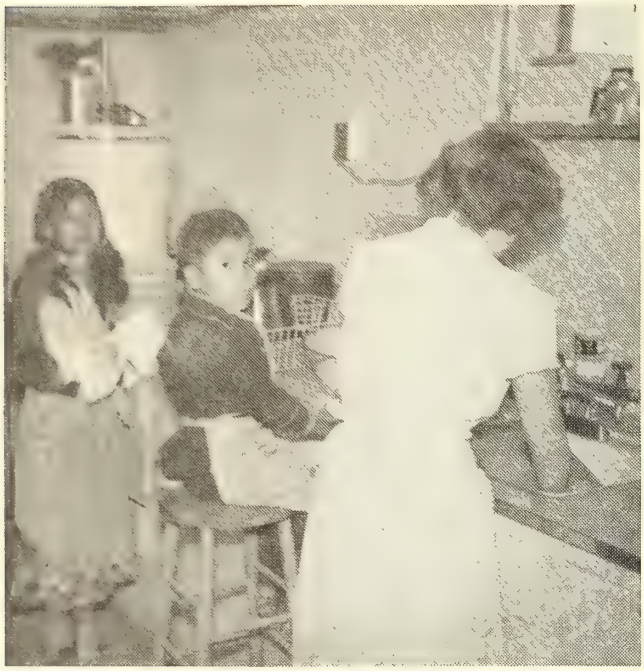
Quotes in the News



Bertrand Russell, British philosopher: "Scientific methods of warfare have had the unexpected result of making war absurd. War can no longer be used as an effective instrument of policy, because nuclear weapons will destroy most of the participants in any war and may even destroy the human race."

Mrs. Glenn G. Hayes, president of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union: "Alcoholism has become the nation's major social and economic problem. The incidence of alcoholism in the U.S. now exceeds that of tuberculosis by 10 per cent, cancer by 50 per cent and polio by 225 per cent. Economic losses from alcoholism alone are estimated at $778,000,000 a year."

David Sarnoff, board chairman of the Radio Corporation of America: "Many more people now sense the need of a moral compass to steer by, if only because they recognize that today a single blundering act may prove fatal to our civilization, if not to the continuance of the race of man."

Dr. Carl S. Winters, pastor of First Baptist church, Oak Park, Ill.: "Alcoholics are multiplying twenty times faster than A. A. or all other rehabilitation groups can salvage these victims. America is in danger of moral bankruptcy and the undermining of American standards and ideals, unless an effective unification of church attitudes and programs is soon achieved."

John A. Mackay, president of Princeton Theological Seminary: "The Servant image must more and more become regnant in the thought and devotion of every Christian, of every Christian church and of every Christian movement, if the body of Christ is to match this hour. Christ needs servants, not patrons or masters."

BONG! Bong, bong! Bong, bong! The bell you hear is that used to call folks together for any occasion at Lybrook Indian mission. At this ringing you see Navaho children racing toward the schoolroom from the baseball field, the swings and teeter-totters, and the volleyball court. The occasion is vacation Bible school.

If you were a visitor at Lybrook on any of the days during Bible school, you would go along with the Navaho children into the schoolroom for devotions conducted by the Bible school director, Mrs. Joann Owen. Everything will be going along fine, at least you think so, and then suddenly they will start singing in Navaho a song like "T'oo Ba'adli'" and you will sit up and listen, stumped. From the tune you will soon recognize the old familiar "Only Trust Him." Now you're wondering how Joann knows Navaho. Well, that is why all the workers here are taking Navaho lessons.

After approximately twenty minutes of devotions the children will scatter to separate areas of the mission for one-hour classes. We shall stay to listen while Joann gives her first and second graders a story about different children of the world.

Then we shall be drawn to the Ikenberrys' kitchen by a little boy's crying and find there Mrs. Ruth Wagoner trying to talk loud enough to be heard over Jimmie's wails, telling the story of Jesus. She is having quite a time making herself clear to these little tots, since they know hardly any English. Standing by her side is the interpreter whom we hired especially for these two weeks. Bertha is a typical Navaho girl; she is eighteen years old, quite attractive, and knows the English language very well. Most of Ruth's and Bertha's time is taken up by watching these four- and five-year-olds so that they do not fall off swings or slide off teeter-totters.

By now you are eager to see the work of the older children, who have been away to government schools. So you climb the big, broad stairs to the second floor of the rough-lumber garage, open the door and for the second time you are surprised. These children know English just about as well as you do and they are using it. The teacher is introduced to you as Miss Lula Miller, a public school teacher of Washington, D.C., who wanted to help for these two weeks. These young people, ages twelve to nineteen, look you over thoroughly and go back to studying about "God's World."

Bong! Bong, bong! There goes that bell again and this time it means recreation. The group splits into two sections. The older ones go with Bill Sherman to play baseball, have a scavenger hunt, play volleyball or do anything else to use up that excess energy. The younger ones, directed by John Becker, are playing gentler games such as kick baseball, dodge ball or baseball played with a ping-pong paddle and ball.

At the most exciting point of these games the bell rings to call the children to crafts classes. The older girls go to the kitchen to sew on skirts and blouses, under the direction of Miss Miller. The boys run to the shop where they grab their masterpieces in woodwork and start sawing, hammering, sanding and painting. The fellow who's controlling and directing all this activity is Ed Owen.

Smell some peculiar odors? It is no wonder if you do—that is I in the kitchen cooking one of any number of my Pennsylvania Dutch specialties. It is quite a job to make pot-pie for forty-five to fifty people, but it is satisfying to see it all eaten. After dinner three of the older children, usually girls, but sometimes boys, will rush into the kitchen and help clean up the stacks and stacks of dirty dishes.

As soon as the dishes are completed everyone gathers in the schoolroom for a story by Mrs. Ikenberry or one of the other adults. The last day Mr. Ikenberry gave a talk on the effects of the use of alcohol, cigarettes and peyote.* After closing the day with a final hymn and prayer, all not interested in reading lessons in Navaho dash for the best seats in the truck and they are on their way home.

Bible School is over for the day and now you realize that the only BVS'er who did not have his fingers in these rapidly moving activities was Dick Wagoner. Never fear; he is working all right. Take a peek around one of many corners and you will notice him overseeing and working on maintenance jobs.

You have a long way to travel yet tonight and so you take your leave. The BVS'ers, along with the others, were glad to have you visit and see the opportunities for continued service here at Lybrook Indian mission.

RELIEF and rehabilitation"—yes, we hear those terms often when speaking of alternative service, but exactly what do they mean? Are they just a Selective Service classification of a type of I-W work? Or might they be more?

To the Cuyahoga County Christian Youth Council, which is the youth arm of the Cleveland Church Federation, they have a deeper meaning. Through love and the work, which is love made visible, CCCYC tried to make those words live. The Youth Council strives to serve all the youth of Greater Cleveland with a year-round program, directed by its officers and one full-time volunteer. The volunteer helps with all Youth Council activities, concentrating on "relief and rehabilitation."

To CCCYC this means week-end work camps and the collection of used clothing for relief. The week-end work camp program, now in its third year, strives to hold two camps each month from September through May. A camp begins at 6:00 p.m. on Friday night and continues through Sunday noon. In this time we try to show a clear picture of all phases of life in the underprivileged area in which we are working. Most of our work is quite simple, but involves need for a little ingenuity on the part of the camper. Usually our project is painting, patching plaster, scraping off wallpaper or some similar type of work.

The work camp offers a great opportunity for youth to learn to live together. It also helps to break down racial prejudice and increases respect and love of the individual, without regard to race, creed or color. Week-end work camping is one of the most inspiring short term service projects in existence. The best proof is that once a youth comes, he is an enthusiastic work camper from then on.

The Hallowe'en scavenger hunt is CCCYC's other big yearly project. Each year the Youth Council entreats all the youth groups in Greater Cleveland to help collect used clothing to send overseas. On Friday night preceding Hallowe'en the youth canvass the city, collecting clothing. The Youth Council devises a method of collecting all this clothing and shipping it to the Church World Service processing center in New Windsor, Md. Last year fifteen tons of clothing and $450 were collected through the efforts of more than 100 youth groups and churches. Such a large task requires much work done in advance by CCCYC officers and the volunteer.

This is a glimpse of just one of many Brethren Volunteer Service projects. Anyone who gives a year or two to God and the church, a year to witness for Christ and the way of peace, will surely have interesting experiences on any project; more important by far will be his spiritual gain.

Use That Extra Hour!

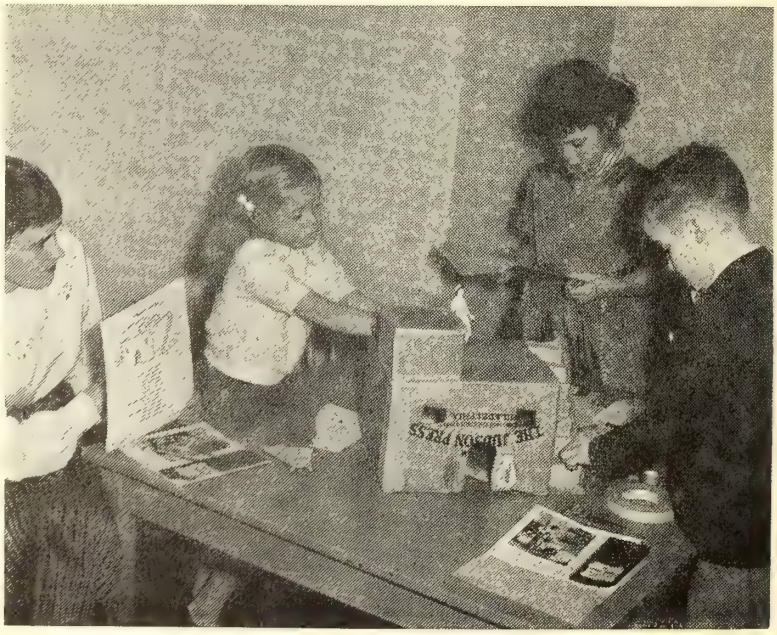
H. Lawrence Rice
Roanoke, Virginia

THE first step in the Christian education program of the local church is to come to think first, last and always of people. It was with this thought in mind that we tried to discover what we could do in the local church to make Christ real and to give the church a central theme in the lives of our children and young people.

We discovered, and it was not a new discovery, that there was not enough time to do an adequate teaching job in the church school hour which had been allotted. By the time all of the preliminaries were completed and discussion of the next week's projects were out of the way, there was precious little time to do actual teaching.

In many evaluation sessions of the program at Ninth Street (Roanoke, Va.) we endeavored to work out a solution. We realize that all the problems have not been solved, but we do have more time for training and instruction.

Planning for an extended session or a children's church must come early and must be thought through and worked out over a long period of time. We started ours with an evaluation of our program including a regular teacher training course meeting ten weeks out of every calendar year. This is one of the secrets of a good and valuable program of Christian education.



We would not want to be without our extended session. We have had to call it a children's church, since the idea of an extended session was too new. It is not a junior church. It is not a replica of an adult worship experience. It is a session in which the children are allowed the freedom necessary to gain a spiritual influence from the teacher, the environment and the curriculum.

The classes begin at 9:45 for every age group. At 10:45 those from the twelve-year-olds through adults go to the eleven o'clock worship. Those under twelve remain in their departments for the next hour. In our regular church school hour we are closely graded in the children's departments, that is, there is a class for every individual year of age. Because of the difficulties of maintaining a staff, our children's extended session is group graded, that is, we have a junior group, a kindergarten group, two primary groups and two nursery groups. We started with only one group per department, but these became too large so additional classes were formed.

There has been some discussion as to whether or not the juniors should be included in an extended session. We find the plan to be very practical to include them. First of all, we discovered that our juniors were not attending the adult worship experience. They do attend the extended session. If one can count numbers alone, without relating numbers to any spiritual values, we would have to say that the extended session has been most satisfying and most successful. Those who normally stayed in a morning worship experience were very few. Now we have a large group of children staying in their extended session.

One of the problems involved in an extended session is the matter of staff personnel. We do not have the ultimate answer. We have tried an experiment. For a year now, our staff has been on a rotating basis. Each corps of teachers rotates with the calendar months. Each corps is composed of at least two persons for each department. More teachers are used for more children. These persons are asked to take the children's session only for a period of a month at a time. There is always some carry-over of teaching personnel from the first church school hour to the second hour, so that there can be an extension of ideas and materials.

Another problem of the extended session has been that of curriculum materials. In some of the newer materials, especially in the junior groups, there are plans and procedures listed in the teacher's manual for this extra session. For the most part we have developed a curriculum which supplements the curriculum of the church school. There is instruction. Activities are used. Crafts and skills are developed. There is a worship period in which hymns are used and taught. Picture study, dramatization and an emphasis on Biblical materials are all related to the total curriculum of the church school.

A director of the extended session is employed on a volunteer basis. This person helps to plan in the setting up of the total program with the co-operation of the board of Christian education and the director of children's work. He has been trained to handle materials and personnel.

The total program which is developed by these persons is more flexible than the curriculum of the first session. It not only includes things which have not been accomplished in the church school hour but additional materials are used. We are in the process at the present time of developing a program designed to use hand puppets in telling the stories of the New Testament. Also, this extended session gives us the opportunity for using filmstrips and films related to life. An opportunity for study and growth exists if you will use the time which is at your disposal.

Does it not seem feasible that each of us in our local churches could use more time? I have heard on many occasions that our crying need is to have our children under the influence and guidance of the church more hours per week. We say to the public schools—you are to teach my child arithmetic—you are to have that child five or six hours a day, five days a week for nine months. We say to the church—you are to teach my child religion and the influence which Christ has upon life now. However, we say to the church, you can have my child only one half hour per week or, at the best, one hour per week. To those of us who want to make religion vital we must find more time to have the children under the influence of the church.

If you do not see how you can develop an extended session, you might find the opportunity for a story hour. A story period could be developed to take place during the sermon time. Under this procedure the children participate in the worship service and then are permitted to leave the sanctuary just before the sermon to go into separate rooms where a person, or persons, makes the Biblical accounts live. It must not be just any story. It should not be read, but it must be told and told as if the story-teller were living it. These stories should have a continuing theme. To simply take children and place them in a room with a storyteller and then tell a story may not be meeting their needs. There should be some continuity which means that the story is not some isolated event.

There are also other churches who bring their children together in the evening at 6:30 for a story hour. At that time they actually have an experience of worship as well as stories.

These are all methods by which we can reach our children more hours per week. We have not found all of the answers, but surely the extended session is part of the answer. I would like to challenge every pastor and every teacher to consider these possibilities, to sacrifice the time necessary to enlarge the curriculum and to put into force a plan to keep the children in closer contact with the church.

There are many criticisms of the program. The greatest criticism I have heard is that these children need to have the experiences of adult worship. To provide for that criticism we allow our children to come into the sanctuary of the church one Sunday per month for worship; they leave then before the sermon to go into their individual departments to take up again their work.

As time has gone on we have found the extended session becoming more valuable. It is now an integral part of our program of Christian education.

A program such as this will make certain demands upon every one who tries it. But every worth-while endeavor also costs in sweat and tears. An extended session will challenge you, but you can meet the challenge!

Seeing Nigeria With Dorris Blough

This is the first of a series of articles concerning the author's impressions of Africa during her first year there. Other articles will appear every two weeks.

UPON arriving on the Africa mission field, we became aware of how different Africa is from what we had anticipated, despite all the pictures we had seen and the people with whom we had talked. I have set a goal of helping people at home to understand Nigeria better, its people and the work here.

First, let us refute some commonly accepted ideas about Nigeria. No one statement can be made about Africa which can apply to all of it. When one thinks of Africa, one immediately pictures a hot steamy jungle with clouds of mosquitoes and snakes aplenty. We had been here six months before we experienced an uncomfortable night because of heat, and so far we have seen nothing as torrid as Kansas can be at times. There are mosquitoes, but not in the swarms we expected. During the dry season there are not many. We have seen one snake, a harmless one. To be sure they are present, but they are not any more eager to meet a person than we are to meet them. There is a leopard living on a mountain close by, but he does not fancy human company.

I would like you to throw out any preconceived notions about "Africa" and remember I am talking about one very small part of Africa —Nigeria—and a tiny part of Northern Nigeria at that.

This is a fascinating place and we want you to understand and enjoy it also. Keep in mind that a letter we might write a year from now will have impressions different from those we would write now, but perhaps we can all come to understand this culture together.

We are stationed at Garkida, replacing the Dr. Paul Petchers who went home on regular furlough. Garkida was the site of the original mission station. The native leaders did not want the mission to come to this area; so they gave permission for work to be started at Garkida, thinking it would not last long. But instead of knocking the missionaries off the map, the mission has put Garkida on the map, so to speak. It is still too small to find on most maps, but it is a big place in the minds of the people in this area.

Garkida is the headquarters of the Church of the Brethren mission. The main office is here. A shop for automobile upkeep is located here. There is a junior primary school (first through fourth grades) and a senior primary school (fifth and sixth grades.) There are the hospital and the leprosarium. We see missionaries from other stations quite often since those in this area come here for their health care and for business.

Ecuador, Country of Contrasts

Mrs. Vernon Kinzie
Tonasket, Washington

ECUADOR is known as the country of contrasts. And it is that to one who is visiting there for the first time. There is evidence of great richness and extreme poverty, the very old and the very new, the primitive and modern all existing side by side. To the observer it would appear that each was oblivious of the other.

On the main street of Quito there were many foreign makes of cars, imported from the States, Germany and England. Along beside them would be walking, or more correctly trotting, a man bent way over with the weight of a wardrobe or whatever he was carrying on his back. There would be women carrying produce, jars of water, or whatever was to be moved, in the same manner. Everywhere you looked there would be a man, woman or child burdened with a load on his back—cheap labor, prematurely aging the carrier, usually an Indian.

In Quito are over fifty cathedrals, all very old. The first mass was said in 1534 and soon after work was started on actual buildings. Many of the cathedrals have attached to them museums, where are exhibited paintings, sculpture and vestments dating back to the 16th and 17th centuries. There is much emphasis on old things, the "dead" Christ and the crucifix. Right up against this medieval type of architecture and philosophy, one can see an occasional ultra-modern store or office building with its insistence on the very latest style in design. Close to the cathedral may be a theater, showing a late release from England or the States.

This same contrast is seen in the people and their dress. Side by side may walk the most fastidiously dressed Ecuadoran, with all that is the ultra here at home, and the Indian, barefoot, wearing hand-woven garments styled as his ancesters were, thread worn and many times patched.

This is also true out in the country. Here is the palatial home of the landowner and scattered over the acreage are the adobe homes of the workers, mostly Indians. For them water, food and fuel are scarce, and the days are relieved only by a fiesta or family celebration.

For this latter group, education is almost lacking, not owing to lack of constitutional rights, but rather to the lack of public educational facilities, the time and energy to attend. Hospitals for the poor are few and sanitation is almost nil. Wages are very low, nutrition poor and the future bleak.

It is in a situation of contrasts that the Brethren mission was started (1946) at Llano Grande, twelve miles out from Quito. Here are the very poor, who have contacts with the very rich. Here are the illiterate, who yearn to be able to read. Here are the sick, who are learning that there are ways to alleviate pain and suffering. Here are the hungry, who are beginning to find out there is food in other parts of the world. Here meet the old culture of the Quechua Indian, antedating that of the Inca, and the newer one of the Spanish—called whites or nationals in the vernacular of the day. So the church is bilingual and bicultural, fitting into the existing patterns of living.

To further meet these contrasts and allow a fuller witness to the gospel of Jesus, the mission serves in humble ways: a simple breakfast and lunch for the school children; school garden plots, tended by the boys, where improved ways of farming may be demonstrated and new vegetables introduced; a nurse who visits the sick in humble homes and tends their ills at her office; sewing classes; literacy classes; an agriculturalist who is trying to interest the Indian in improving his livestock and grain; and the many daily contacts of kindliness and love shown in the activities of the missionaries.

May we remember to pray for this country, that some day Ecuador may not have all these varied contrasts, but the abundant life which is promised in Christ Jesus.

There are seven mission families and three single women at Garkida, so our fellowship is large, comparatively speaking. Garkida village itself has a population of several thousand. It is the market center for a large area.

The Bura word for mountain is gar. The original beginnings of the village were near the mountain named Kida; hence the name of Garkida.

Ruth Brooks writes from India: "We have just finished a young laymen's institute with one hundred young men in from the district. There was a record sale of hymnbooks and our New Testaments and Bibles were all sold out."

MICHIGAN Plans Goals and Strategy

Charles E. Zunkel

THE District Council of Boards initiated action by appointing a Goals and Strategy Committee to make a careful study of the needs of the church in Michigan and then present a long-range plan of action to be considered by the Council of Boards and by district conference of 1955.

A most creative approach was made to the study and plan of action. It resulted in a series of recommendations which were to be picked up and set in motion as the years unfold and the movement gains momentum. Present long-range proposals include the following:

1. "A total program of stewardship education and action . . . that will reach and teach and enlist every member of the church in the district." This is to be a major goal for 1955-56.

2. "A strategy . . . for starting new churches in our district . . . would include location . . . building sites . . . raising funds . . . nucleus of leaders, pastoral care, community survey, etc."

(1) "A tentative goal of one new church every three years."

(2) "A minimum of $3.00 per member" giving for this work.

3. "A long-range program of evangelism . . . that gives specific help and encouragement to each church . . . developing in every member . . . an evangelistic concern or passion for the straying and lost, plus . . . help in making effective this concern."

(1) A determined effort to revive and restore to full fellowship within the next five years all inactive or semi-active members.

(2) A minimum goal each year of ten per cent increase in membership and attendance.

4. "A total program of Christian education . . . concentrating on teaching what Jesus taught, so that all will know, understand, believe and live (it) out."

(1) Develop "a sound and mature faith."

(2) Learn "to know the living Christ personally," being "conscious he is with us always."

5. "Encourage and assist young people to find life's vocation in terms of the will of God. Lead increasing numbers to service through the church in ministry, home and foreign missions.

(1) Encourage giving at least one year to Brethren Volunteer Service.

6. "Study [by a committee] the most effective patterns of [district] organization and administration" to carry out the program.

During 1955-56

For the year 1955-56 attention is being focused on stewardship and church extension. The following items were considered important:

1. Exploration of areas for work in the near future.

2. Securing building sites several years ahead of time of actual beginning of work.

3. Raising funds. This is to include a thorough program of stewardship education in every church.

(1) Training district and local leaders.

(2) Regular weekly giving.

(3) Three dollars per member commitment for church extension.

(4) Aid to churches to come from a revolving fund, loaned to each without interest.

4. Providing leadership for nucleus, for survey work, pastoral care and supervision.

5. Establishing a pattern of development in work attempted.

There is no question that this is a bold and courageous venture of faith. If it is followed through with care and persistence, there will be great good emerging from it. As the years unfold and new areas of the plan are picked up and developed, every phase of the church's life and work can be vitalized.

Other districts of the Brotherhood may well give careful thought to their plans to "Seek First His Kingdom."

"He took bread, and gave thanks" (Luke 22:19)

GRACE BEFORE MEALS

Bread of life, whose body, broken,
Feeds the hunger of my heart,
May the thanks that thou hast spoken
Bless each loaf I cut apart.

Thou who, breaking bread with brothers,
Bared thy body, gave thy blood,
Help me share my loaf with others
Hungering for brotherhood.

Let these hands now calmly folding
Speak my gratitude for grace,
Lest the treasure I am holding
Disappear before my face.

Lord, I welcome thee to table;
Grace my supper, host divine;
With thy feast of love enable
Every guest to live as thine.—K. M.

Large Church Signs

In the Oct. 15 issue, I agree with Religious Advertising by "A Traveling Man." We ought to be just as aggressive in selling our Christ to the public as any commercial firm is in selling its wares.

Our Minot church purchased five road signs 24" x 30" and I feel we threw our money away—wasted it. Why? Because the highway department has ruled the signs must be eighty feet away from the center of the highway. We have three U.S. highways through Minot, 83, 2, and 52. I was driving east on Route 2 and had two men along; I asked them if they could read the sign and they could not. I was driving fifty miles per hour. So I advise any of our churches not to buy such small signs. They should be 4' x 4' and printed on one side only—then set at an angle of about fifteen degrees to the highway. Yes, we have something of infinitely greater value to sell than any commercial firm.—M. W. Petry, Minot, N. Dak.

Our Problems

At the opening of our county schools for the first time we have colored children in two schools. There was some trouble for several weeks with meetings, etc. I wrote a letter to our county papers, two paragraphs of which are given here:

"We can solve our problems here in Carroll County if we so will to do. If we can not agree in free and open discussion, we go to various courts of our land. We cannot hope that all of us will always agree. In a democracy we must live by the wish of the majority. We have our state legislature to make our laws. We have the right to vote for the members of that body. The same is true of the United States Congress. We have many laws. Most laws, we agree, are good laws for the benefit of all the people. Certainly, some laws are bad for the people. We have the right to repeal bad laws. We have the right every two years to change the members of Congress, every four years to change the members of our legislature, and every six years to change our United States senators. We must, however, obey the law—good or bad—until we remove it from the laws of our land. We will keep or lose our democratic form of government by our respect for and obedience to our laws, lawmakers and courts. The great danger is from within, not from without.

"Each of us has within our own hands the power to build or destroy. Each of us is responsible for the course we take. Man has done and can do many great things. There are, however, some things beyond our control. In this country we have a precious religious heritage. As Christians, if and when any problem gets too big for us to solve, we are called individually and collectively to go to God in prayer. Jesus said, 'I come to teach you a new way.' Our problems can be solved if we live by the two great commandments which Jesus gave us: 'You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your strength, and with all your mind; and your neighbor as yourself.'"—Carroll S. Rinehart, Westminster, Md.

The God of Hope

"Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing that you may abound in hope, through the power of the Holy Ghost."

Hope is one of the greatest gifts God ever gave to his people. Let us not look at the way the world would be, were it not for this God-given hope. But rather let us consider the countless blessings afforded us because of it.

Someone has said that "hope answers well for breakfast but makes a poor supper." This blessed hope remains buoyant and unchanged, when all other emotions are controlled by events. But who is there without hope? The fettered prisoner, the friendless wanderer, the diseased sufferer, each cherishes at least a spark of this ever-living hope.

Our blessings may come in disguise, yet we are always hoping for something better. This flower of hope should be cultivated more today. May God strengthen us in this hope.—Orpha Nusbaum, Middlebury, Ind.

The Thanks that made America famous

Richard N. Miller

IF YOU were looking for the thing that made America famous, you would find it was not power. That came just recently, and it has made us notorious, rather than famous, in the eyes of many of our neighbors.

You would find it was not intelligence. Germany has had us beat on this score with her logical systems and scientific achievements. We are gaining, but we are not noted for intelligence.

And you would find it was not just plain hard work. We are not unique in this. To the contrary, Benjamin Franklin used to say that we are the laziest people on earth, always trying to find an easier way to do things.

It was none of these things, for I think you would find that it was thanks that made America famous. On December 21, 1620, the Pilgrims arriving on the Mayflower knelt at Plymouth harbor and gave thanks to God for their safe journey. America was begun in a mood of thankfulness.

That was before hardships. They were not prepared for the winter months. They had to build houses (that was in a day before they needed building permits, but they still had trouble). They needed food (High-Low and A & P had not built their stores at Pilgrim and Plymouth Streets yet).

Before that first hard winter passed, over half of these Pilgrims perished. The rest stayed on. When spring came they planted corn. The summer came and passed and they hoed corn. Then the fall and the harvest came, and their corn proved well.

And then what did they do? They might have cursed God for taking their loved ones and making it so hard for them. But they did not. They might have patted themselves on the back for what they had accomplished. They did not do that either as far as I know. They simply thanked God for his goodness to them.

That was the beginning of our Thanksgiving Day. It was not an annual observance for the colony—at least, a special day—until 1630, and then other New England colonies took up the practice. Then, about 234 years later, Abraham Lincoln proclaimed the fourth Thursday of November as a national day of Thanksgiving.

But lest we forget, it is not the day that makes America famous. It is the attitude. When we begin to lose this attitude of thankfulness, we begin to lose our right to fame.

It is interesting how both individuals and nations, beginning on the road to fame, are thankful for even the little things that bless their lives. Then suddenly, recognizing they have their fame, they feel that they have gained it by themselves and have only themselves to thank.

It is like the corner weed patch that Gus had taken over and made into a beautiful garden. The minister, passing by and observing the miraculous face lifting, said, "You and God sure have a beautiful garden this year." To which Gus replied, "Yes, I guess so, but you should have seen the mess last year when God had it all to himself."

The story is usually employed to give us a shot in the arm and show us just how important we are in this universe. And it is true; God does need us. But I have always wanted to come back at Gus and say, "I would like to see your garden if you had it all to yourself."

I have a sneaking suspicion that Gus, having gained fame, forgot for a time what a mess it would have been if he had it all to do by himself. He needed the rain, the sunshine, the power of a dying seed, the busy creatures crumbling up the soil, the decaying vegetation, the night of rest and all provided in the right combination.

Maybe many of us are like Gus, thinking how thankful God ought to be for having us and our nation. And that is a dangerous attitude. It creates all kinds of selfishness and pride.

It is that kind of thinking that prompted California to demand that all the churches sign loyalty pledges to the state. We seem to be getting our thankfulness and loyalties turned around. Our country was founded by men who were supremely thankful for all that God had done for them and they could do no other than to give their loyalty to him. Having become a little famous, we now want to be sure that everyone within our borders is supremely thankful and loyal to our nation.

I think that Abraham Lincoln would have been a little surprised at this latter development. In his first national Thanksgiving Proclamation he hoped that "in every quarter of the globe our nationality would be recognized in connection with our great gratitude to the Divine Giver of all our blessings."

There are other dangers, too, like this one I ran across from the pen of Will Carleton; who fears that Thanksgiving Day may be observed not so much "To thank the Lord for blessings o'er,

As for the sake of getting more!"

The attitude that made America famous was thankfulness for the freedom to worship, for the gifts of the land and for his watchful care. The thankfulness that made us famous was never used as a bribe. When it becomes this, we lose our right to fame among the nations and under God.

I think if Jesus would come among us, he would tell us a parable—a parable of national thanksgiving. Perhaps it would be something like this.

Two nations went up to pray and give thanks. The one prayed to himself like this: "I thank thee that I am not as other nations. I have become wealthy by the sweat of my people's brow. I have become strong by the might of my people. I have become famous by the genius of my people. I have become self-sufficient, for I can feed myself, clothe myself, and house myself. All things have I discovered and I give thee thanks that they are mine."

A GREAT THANKSGIVING DAY

GLADYS PALMER EBY

Today the nation pauses to give thanks to God for food,
Our tables heaped up high with much of everything that's good.
We say, "Our thanks for homes and friends and health and work and play";
Our thoughts are overwhelming—therefore do we pray.

It's human nature to give thanks when things are heaped up high
When spirits soar with happiness and life is "apple pie";
The Giver of all good is praised, when everything goes well,
And the Father hears his children—more than we can tell.

But sometimes he may wonder if we mean to be blasé,
The way we take for granted that the sun comes up each day;
That flowers bloom and raindrops fall and children laugh, although
They don't know why they're happy, except they love us so.

Today perhaps he wonders, with the world at our door,
With heaven edging nearer, its secrets to explore
Why we are not more grateful, we do not find some way
To a truly world-wide brotherhood, a great Thanksgiving day!

Watch Out for Faith Healers

THERE is a growing interest in spiritual healing on the part of many church groups. For this we can be grateful. But there also seems to be a growing number of "faith healers" who perform their miracles before vast audiences and even on television. They claim to have special gifts and they advertise their powers. They need to be closely watched.

A Presbyterian minister in Atlanta, Georgia, has taken the trouble to study carefully the methods of faith healers and their reputed successes. He finds that people with no organic ailments often are helped by these mass demonstrations of faith, but he discovers also that applicants for the "healing line"—the persons who actually appear before the healer—are carefully screened so that the genuinely crippled or disabled seldom get the evangelist's personal attention.

The minister was persistent also in following through to see if the cures were lasting. In case after case there was no change at all, but actual damage was done when trusting people turned to a so-called faith healer rather than take the advice of a physician. The minister also examined some of the printed endorsements and claims made by such healers. He found that many of the "doctors" they quote are not qualified or licensed physicians and their testimonies cannot be accepted as reliable.

Surely the healing ministry of Jesus was of a quite different order from the work of today's faith healers. Instead of seeking publicity and prestige, Jesus actually withdrew from the crowds that sought him. One cannot imagine his boasting of the size of his tent or of the number of applicants for healing. Instead of extolling his own miracles of healing he warned that false prophets would arise and show great signs and wonders, and at the day of judgment many who did mighty works in his name would hear him say, "I never knew you; depart from me, you evil doers."

Indeed, there is a place for spiritual healing, not as some phenomenon or sign to draw crowds but as an experience of genuine faith and trust in God. The anointing service, for example, has brought relief from pain and restoration of health and many miracles of healing might be attributed to it. But this New Testament practice never calls for a star performer with a "special gift" and a publicity department. It calls for the stable, tested, devoted ministrations of ordinary men—who know the power of the Holy Spirit not only in their hands but in their entire lives. It calls for repentance as well as faith. It is effective because it requires commitment of life—body, mind and spirit—to the kingdom of God.

Sincere Christians who know the healing power of prayer in their own experiences should be the last to be taken in by false prophets who are far from Christian in their methods or motives for healing.—K.M.

A Proclamation

THE custom of devoting one day each year to national thanksgiving is a wise and an ancient one, hallowed by observance in the days before we became a nation, and sanctioned throughout the succeeding generations. It is therefore in keeping with our oldest traditions that at the fruitful season of the waning year we turn again to almighty God in grateful acknowledgement of his manifold blessings.

At this time of thanksgiving, may we express our deep appreciation of those forebears who, more than three centuries ago, celebrated the first Thanksgiving Day. Through their industry and courage, our nation was hewn from the virgin forest, and through their steadfastness and faith, the ideals of liberty and justice have become our cherished inheritance.

May we lift up our hearts in special prayers of gratitude for the abundance of our endowments, both material and spiritual, for the preservation of our way of life, in its richness and fullness, and for the religious faith which has wielded such a beneficent influence upon our destiny. May we show our thanks for our own bounty by remembrance of those less fortunate and may the spirit of this Thanksgiving season move us to share with them to alleviate their need.

Now, therefore, I, Dwight D. Eisenhower, President of the United States of America, having in mind the joint Congressional resolution of December 26, 1941, which designated the fourth Thursday of November in each year as Thanksgiving Day and made that day a legal holiday, do hereby proclaim Thursday, the twenty-fourth day of November, 1955, as a day of national thanksgiving; and I urge all our citizens to observe the day with reverence. Let us, on the appointed day, in our homes and our accustomed places of worship, each according to his faith, bow before God and give him humble thanks.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the Seal of the United States of America to be affixed.

THE last glimpse I had of her was as she stood beside the road, leaning on two crude homemade crutches and waving. She was little, bent and crippled—seventy-year-old Roza Legman, at Dugo Selo, Croatia, one of those who receive a more abundant life through foods from American surplus stocks.

We found her sitting on a stool under a tree, spinning hemp thread with distaff and spindle. She was not in her "house" for there was scarcely room in the earth-floored lean-to to sit, other than on the bed, on the one combination tablechest or on the stove.

When she learned that the "Americans" were connected with the gifts which made possible for her a fairly satisfactory food supply, her excited gratitude became almost embarrassing. Taking my hand in both of hers, she talked rapidly and emotionally in her language. One did not need to understand the words to know what she was saying.

Roza lives almost entirely on what others give her. Homeless, she is allowed the use of a six-by-nine-foot brick lean-to by a family with twelve members. Her toothless jaws have no particular trouble in gumming her food, but the lack of teeth troubles her in the spinning, so she uses her lips to pull out the hemp while twirling the spindle.

Created in the image of God, but destitute!

Barefoot, eighty-two-year-old Kristina Babin stood willingly and proudly for a picture beside the little brick-and-iron stove in her dazzlingly whitewashed room. Stove, clean bed and a table comprised the entire furnishings. I did not see where she stored the foods which had been given her, but did see her gratitude for them.

Then we learned that the day before this old lady had walked for six miles on her twisted feet, half of the miles with a big bundle of wood she had cut out in the forest. When I wanted to take a picture of her with the wood on her back, her pride said "No." She had seen better days here in her village of Sid, Serbia, but was now reduced largely to dependence on others.

It was about ten o'clock on Tuesday morning when we climbed to a second story two-rooms-and-a-hall apartment in Cernuce, Slovenia.

We had been expected in this village for a food distribution on Sunday, but had been delayed. Now we were visiting homes where the food had gone—a pound or two of milk powder, a couple of pounds of shortening and a couple of pounds of cheese.

In this home, with the father unable to work, the family of four had a hard time to get enough food to keep going. I entered the door just in time to see the last of the cheese disappear down the throat of the nine-year-old girl, who with this cheese and bread was making her breakfast.

They urged me to sit down, and one of the three chairs in the room was passed over toward where I stood, but did not quite make the trip before disintegrating in going from hand to hand.

When introductions had been made, Angela's mother wept freely as she spoke her thanks for the help. But she said: "It just isn't enough." We had visible proof that it was not, for the cheese had lasted only two days and it would be four weeks until the next distribution.

* * * *

What a contrast it was to see the youngest orphan at Casa Materna near Naples as she was held by her older "sister" while she, at first experimentally, then eagerly tasted the American cheese.

Two hundred fifty children in this institution guided by the saintly Sancti family show the effects of good food, good care and real love. But it does take butter and cheese and oil and shortening and lots of milk simply to supplement the locally acquired vegetables and fruit and bread and infrequently seen meat.

And what a contrast again to go only a couple of miles in the same city to the area where the old Granili refugee camp had been pulled down and see the children there—the same age, the same humane shape, but not the same appearance. Food accounts for part of that difference, but love and care account for much more of it.

Created in the image of God—but become refugees!

Through relief and rehabilitation programs carried on through Church World Service, Christian Rural Overseas Program and the World Council of Churches, the people of our churches will have helped to distribute more than 141,744,425 pounds of milk powder, cheese, butter and butter oil, cottonseed oil and shortening, and cotton from the U.S. surplus stocks during 1955. These goods are going to twenty-eight countries and are helping literally millions of the aged, ill, refugee, poverty-stricken, unfortunate people.

In Vietnam, in Hong Kong, in Japan and Korea such scenes as this are commonplace as older children come to church-supported feeding centers, bearing their younger brothers and sisters on their backs

In addition there will be shipped and distributed the clothing and medicines and foods and other contributed goods given regularly through denominational and interdenominational programs including CWS-CROP.

The SOS program in Europe, where I know it, is not all mere statistics— it is people, these people in Yugoslavia and in Italy and elsewhere.

It is the Italian refugee family from Egypt now living precariously in the fourth-floor walk-up apartment in Bari, where, as I photographed the mother cooking with some of the surplus foods, she asked me not to tell the people that the kitchen was dirty.

It is the help that makes it possible for the community nurse in the room-and-a-half "minimum housing" in Corato, Italy to take in an orphan with her own family and keep all fairly well-fed.

It is the family, father with TB, son so obviously ill that one wonders how long he will live, where the squash cooking over the open fire in the room was fortified and made more palatable with oil from America via CWS, WCC and the Protestant church organization of Italy.

It is the help that goes to those many church institutions of Germany who are caring for a more-than-full complement of people, but who have not been able to recover in equipment and reserves since the war.

SOS is the extra in the program in Belgium where the hardest of the hard-core refugees are taken by this little country to provide them a home until they die.

It is Cimade in France, helping

Extra rations of food are distributed through our Christian programs in the over-crowded Arab refugee camps in the Near East, where nearly a million persons are homeless and destitute to find and feed the hitherto unknown needy in their communities in addition to the refugees and students who are helped.

It is the regular aid to Greece and also the emergency aid to those Greek farmers, who, already living a submarginal existence, suffered a hailstorm that utterly wiped out their crops.

It is the extra food given to the more needy school children in Austria, food that helps to improve scholarship marks but also increases the discipline problem, for well-fed children wiggle more than those with less energy.

"I am come that they may have life, and have it more abundantly." These words of Christ spoken 2,000 years ago have particular application to all who give through their church for the distribution of these life-giving foods among the needy overseas. Are we not, with our great abundance of the world's blessings, come that all these may have life and have it more abundantly?

The Preposition "Of"

Luther A. Weigle

THE most versatile and ambiguous of the prepositions in the King James Version of the Bible is "of." It is used where we would now say "by" —Jesus is said to be baptized of John and led of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil. 'To be seen of them" is "to be seen by them," and "have glory of men" is "be praised by men" (Matt. 6:1-2). "Bidden of any man" is "invited by any one" (Luke 14:8).

"Which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet" may be understood to mean the prophet's word concerning the Lord; the clause is cleared of ambiguity by the present translation, "What the Lord had spoken by the prophet" (Matt. 2:14). Similarly, in John 8:40, "which I have heard of God" means "which I heard from God."

"The zeal of thine house" is "zeal for thy house" (John 2:17); "zealous of the law" is "zealous for the law" (Acts 21:20; and "a zeal of God" is "a zeal for God" (Rom. 10:2). "Of long time" (Acts 8:11) is "for a long time."

The King James Version sometimes uses "of" where we would now use "with." Examples are "in comparison of you" (Judges 8:3) and "provided the king of sustenance" (2 Sam. 19:32). The expression, "I am sick of love" (Song of Solomon 2:5), now implies surfeit and distaste; the better translation of the Hebrew is "I am sick with love."

To "rejoice more of that sheep than of the ninety and nine" (Matt. 18:13) means to "rejoice over it more than over the ninety-nine." "Power of" means "rule over" in 1 Cor. 7:4. "Compassion of" (Heb. 10:34) is "compassion on." Timothy is urged (1 Tim. 4:12), not to "be an example of the believers," but to "set the believers an example."

Occasionally "of" is redundant, and may simply be dropped. Examples are: "Asahel would not turn aside from following of him" (2 Sam. 2:21); and "they thought that he had spoken of taking of rest in sleep" (John 11:13). "They left beating of Paul" (Acts 21:32) means "they stopped beating Paul."

The Meaning of the Prayer Veil

Jack Kline

AMONG the various subjects that agitated the church at Corinth and that caused shedding of tears and sleepless nights for the Apostle Paul, was that of the use and meaning of the prayer veil.

It is well known that Eastern women almost universally practiced the custom of wearing the large veil that covered their complete face when in public. This was practiced both among the Jews and Greeks. In the primitive or New Testament church, the custom or tradition was for the women to wear some sort of covering or veil over their hair and head when worshiping, that is, when praying, teaching the word of God or prophesying. And in like manner the men at such times uncovered their hair and head.

This custom of the early church was a sign of decorum and reverence in worship.

For the men to wear their hats or turbans or coverings in the house or worship assembly would be an act of irreverence, ill-conduct, lack of dignity and, finally, a rejection of the authority of Christ.

In like manner, for the women to remove their covering from off their heads during worship would be a sign of irreverence, ill-conduct, lack of dignity and, finally, a rejection of the authority of Christ and the angels who were believed to be ever present.

Thus, the real meaning of the prayer veil had significance to the primitive New Testament church as an act of reverence on the part of both men and women. It was a fitting act of dignity in the worship of God. And it was a sign of the recognition of the authority of Christ, a symbol that the Messiah had come and ruled in the hearts of holy men and women.

But since we are Western people and the customs of dress have changed we face this question: Why have Brethren believed in wearing the prayer veil?

Since the fourth century A.D. Hebrew men of Orthodox Judaism cover their heads when worshiping as a sign of sorrow that the Messiah has not come. By the opposing sign the Christian man removes his head covering in rejoicing that the Messiah has come and that he has "all power" and "all authority in heaven and on earth."

Concerning the women, Brethren have believed that to be brought into the full authority of and to recognize the full authority of Christ, women will want to observe the practice of the early church. So in worship she wears a veil or head covering as Paul states is the practice in all churches: "Any woman who prays or prophesies with her head unveiled dishonors her head" (1 Cor. 11:5, R.S.V.).

The veil or head covering of the woman is a sign that she recognizes the authority of Christ and in this authority she has the right and authority to expound or teach the Scriptures, to exhort, to lead in prayer and in worship. From the New Testament we learn that women were deaconesses (Rom. 16: 1), that they had an active part in the labors of the gospel, in evangelizing and teaching (Acts 18:26; Phil. 4:3), and in prophesying (Acts 21:9).

Brethren have believed in the observance of the prayer veil because of their desire to be reverent in worship. In this respect it means a congregation of uniformity and dignity. It is somewhat like the choir robes which hide all the frills and

LaTour and Son

The prayer veil indicates that the woman is a witness for Christ and is separated from the world

Pastor of the Lansing church, Michigan

glamorous colors which would attract undue attention to themselves. So the prayer veil worn by the sisters of the church brings out a uniformity, a dignity and a reverence that cannot be attained by the many different styles and shapes of hats. Brethren are not alone in following this observance. Many other denominations have observed the practice in the past and some continue to observe it, such as Mennonites and Roman Catholics.

Brethren have observed the wearing of the prayer veil because they believe it adds to the excellence and beauty of Christian life and character. This is especially true when it is worn all the time as it used to be, and still is in many areas, for then it was easy to distinguish a sister of the Church of the Brethren. It became a glory to her and indicated that she was a witness of Christ. It was a means of denoting separation from the world.

Why do many Brethren continue this practice? First, we might say because we still believe it wise to follow as nearly as possible the doctrines and teachings of the early church, in reality as well as in spirit. It means a living closeness to the spirit and unity of Christ-likeness. It is a continued witness that the Messiah has come and that he now is the Savior of the world.

We would also say that because over the years this way has become a part of us. It has been a part of our heritage and religious tradition. Since it is Biblical, it is not easy to drop it completely. And since there are other denominations which still continue to practice it we are not alone in our belief and practice. It has become a symbol to the Brethren of equality. We have another reminder in the prayer veil that we are all on the same level—"we are all one in Christ Jesus"; there is no distinction in race or sex in Jesus Christ. Whereas in the beginning woman was from man, so now man is of woman. So there is no room for boosting the one above the other, and the prayer veil makes this clear. In Christ

Naomi Will H. K. Zeller, Jr. Jesse Ziegler

The Family Counselor welcomes letters of inquiry. They may be addressed: Family Life Department, General Brotherhood Board, 22 S. State St., Elgin, Ill.

Dear Counselor,

We have been happily married and have children to bless our home. Just recently a problem has come that I seem unable to cope with. My husband has been spending an unusual amount of time at the home of a divorcee. This started as an expression of helpfulness to her as she was in need of many things. As time went on he became very uninterested in doing things around home and spent evenings and Saturday afternoon at her place helping in odd tasks. I said nothing at first but in past weeks I explained and even pleaded that he stay away. He has admitted that he is very mixed up and seems to see not too much harm in this attention. In our discussions he has said that he is sorry if it hurts me but still continues to go doing errands for her.

I know not where to turn. I have tried to act uninterested but I fail and tell him just how I feel. Sometimes I become angry to think that the divorcee tries to talk to him and require my husband's time. My husband has resisted in every way possible to accept the fellowship of worship at our church and has said that he and God are not on speaking terms.

If you could shed some light on our problem, I would greatly appreciate it.

Anxious Wife.

Dear Friend,

As we look at your situation, we are tempted to write of what should have been done or not done in the past weeks, but we must start where you are now and go on from here.

There are several things that are encouraging and hopeful in your husband's attitude, the fact that he is sorry he is hurting you and the fact that he feels he and God are not on speaking terms. He evidently realizes the situation has gotten out of hand and is one that is not pleasing to God, so he would refrain from talking with God or you or any person of high integrity, knowing he would be rebuked for lowering his ideals. If he felt that what he was doing was all right, there would be less hope for him. His regret at hurting you shows, I believe, he still has a high regard, really love, for you in his better moments. It is true he is very "mixed up."

If you haven't already done so, I would suggest you put this whole situation completely into God's hands. Talk it over with the Great Companion and seek his power to bring to your husband conviction of wrong and the courage to throw off this infatuation. Seek his grace to be able to be not less but more kind and loving as a wife than ever. Try, in his strength, to keep happy enough for it to show in your face and the tone of your voice and do your best to make home a pleasant place for your husband and children. It will not be easy, but it is the only way the wounds of the home can be healed and the redemption of your husband brought about. Pray for him and love him.

Having taken God into partnership in your situation, you can take the next step, that of talking it over personally with someone who understands and can help. Since you feel he would not talk with a pastor or church counselor, I suggest you see your Family Service Society and Children's Bureau in your city. (You can find the address in your phone directory.) They will gladly do all they can to help you and will know how to approach your husband to get his co-operation.

Also I would suggest you get the book, The Fine Art of Living Together, by A. W. Beaven, from your city library and lay it where he might read it.

I would recommend great patience. Your childen need at least one stable parent during this strained situation and, in time, things may clear up beyond your fondest hopes. Faith and love can work wonders.

Naomi Will.

Constraining Love

MILDRED ALLEN JEFFERY

God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us (Rom. 5: 8)

"Lord, I'll love folk both good and true,
The ones who pattern after you."
"Love the unlovely," he replied,
"For whom I suffered much, and died."
I looked about and everywhere
Were folk for whom I didn't care.
And then quite suddenly I knew
That I was most unlovely too,
But that his love included me—
And this is his great mystery.

there is equality, and there is authority for both men and women to witness for Christ.

We have found no better symbol to express our faith in the simple life than this. If there is equality, if there is to be no showiness, if there is to be unity and oneness, what better symbol can be found? And so many Brethren continue to use the prayer veil because it was practiced in the early church, because it signifies and symbolizes dignity, reverence and the authority of Christ, because it symbolizes equality and unity in the church, and because it symbolizes purity and bears witness to the resurrected and reigning Christ.

Why are some Brethren discarding the practice of the prayer veil?

First we must recognize the changes brought about by the industrial age. Customs, styles and fashions began to be determined by manufacturers and designers. Better means of travel and transportation brought more of the people into communication with one another. Areas and communities were no longer isolated nor could they be. Plain people and the more fashionable were rubbing shoulders in daily life. The home and the church soon ceased to be the only place for social life. The community, the village and the city began to influence the Brethren to a large extent. Soon the Brethren began to take on many of the customs and habits of the people about them. And so some of the perhaps more extreme customs and beliefs of the Brethren were stressed less, for fear of being too odd and too different. None of us likes to be so much different from those about us. And so gradually the more peculiar customs and beliefs of the Brethren are being discarded.

The prayer veil may also be discarded because many women have felt the covering, or veil, signified that they were not on an equality with the men; thus they put it off and refused to wear it. It is true that the original meaning before Christianity was the superiority of man, and perhaps a part of that meaning carried over into Christianity. But the real meaning was a witness to the authority of the living Christ, a sign of the equality of the sexes in Christ and the church. It is a sign of the authority of Christ upon Christian women to expound or teach the Scriptures, to pray and to exhort. The prayer veil set the Christian woman apart from the immoral and the indecent in the early days of Christianity; thus it was and is a sign or symbol of purity. It does not denote that women are inferior to men, but it indicates a recognition and a witness of the authority of Christ which unites the nations and the sexes.

The third reason why Brethren may discard the prayer veil is because other people do not wear it. A part of the influence of the industrial age in which we live is to bring about uniformity, a uniformity governed by society, rather than a uniformity governed by the church and the teachings of Christ. We are gregarious; we like to be with other people and do what they do. None of us cares to be odd for the sake of being odd. On the other hand, there are perhaps times when it is more noble to be different if being different means the difference between following the teachings of Christ and not following them.

The prayer veil of 1 Cor. 11: 1-16, as understood and practiced by the Brethren, symbolizes reverence, dignity and order in worship. It is a witness to the authority and Messiahship of our Lord and Savior. It is Biblical.

But the other nation stood in a distant corner and prayed to God like this: "I thank thee that thou hast placed me here . . . that thou hast placed ideas in the minds of thy people and wealth in the land of thy nation. I am thankful that I am one among many and that all nations are under thy care. I am thankful that I can share with other nations, for I am but a steward of thy land and thy wealth."

I assure you that the second was the nation that was truly thankful, rather than the first. He became a servant among the nations of the world and was much loved. The first was a hated enemy and God would have him not. The second became famous, the first became notorious.

And so the question resolves itself into whether the thanks that made America famous shall continue to make her famous or whether we shall become notorious, whether Thanksgiving shall be remembered as a daily attitude or only a special day, whether it will be thanks to God or to ourselves, whether it will be thanks for blessings o'er or for the sake of getting more, and whether it will be thanks for what is ours to share or what is ours to keep. What shall it be?

Roads to Understanding

Leona Z. Row

A child cannot be judged by adult standards; he must be accepted as he is and measured by his age group

FOR A long time adults, as parents and teachers, have been studying children so that they might understand them. Many paths leading to understanding have been investigated. Some have seemed right for a time but have turned out to be wrong. We think we know something about what youngsters usually can do at different ages, what seems to matter most to them, what difficulties they get into as they grow up, and how people can help. Some roads seem to lead to understanding.

Understanding is like oil in the engine of the car. It is needed to make things run smoothly. Let us look for some roads which lead to understanding of the child.

To understand a child one must first understand oneself. Self-understanding not only determines our successes and failures—but affects our children's development.

Children are not only the product of the chromosomes and genes they inherit from us. They are also the product of the environment we create for them. It is easy for us to change the homes and churches—but it is hard to see what we can do with our emotional environment. If we know why we behave and feel as we do it is easier to regulate this emotional environment.

What is this unknown part of us that has such a great effect on our children? We know a little about the working of our bodies—but the total personality is made up of our ideas, feelings, hopes, longings, loves, hates—the way we walk, smile or feel. Menninger points out that our total personality is made up of (1) the conscious which we plan and control (one-ninth of the total), (2) the unconscious over which we have no control (which is really the power behind the throne) and (3) the conscience which is the internal policeman which keeps us from doing things wrong and helps us to know what is right.

Adults should plan definitely to choose activities that give them a feeling of confidence, poise and achievement for their tasks in guiding children. For parents and teachers this child care is a temporary assignment. There is nothing more exciting than what parents do right at home with children.

One time I was making a weaving set—a board with nails all around evenly spaced. I had smoothed and polished the board—marked it carefully and then I began to drive the nails. Everything went lovely for a bit—and then when I drove the next nail the beautiful board split. You can imagine how frustrated I felt—all the sanding and marking was wasted, to say nothing of losing the board. My one mistake was the choice of the size of the nails.

We can know all the techniques of handling children but if we cannot understand and solve our own problems we cannot lead our youngsters to abundant living.

The second road to understanding the child is to accept him as he is.

The child is not a small adult —he is a child. Let's not judge him by adult standards—but by standards for his age group.

Growing up is an effort—the youngster is willing but it cuts across the natural processes. It means postponing, holding back, waiting. But the trying is worth it with approval as a reward.

"Angels don't say 'no' or get dirty or talk back or use naughty words. Children do. If you know this, you won't lose your faith in children or feel that they have let you down. You will search for the cause. And once you find it you will know that each kind of cause responds best to a different treatment." So writes James L. Hymes.

The third road to understanding the child is to travel with him. There is no other way.

Yes, we need to be alone enough to understand our own needs, but we cannot understand the children we lead and guide unless we experience together many things that really matter.

First of all, we both need adequate rest and quiet, and physical comfort for healthy bodies. In these days of outside pressures adequate rest almost equals understanding harmony. (Certainly we know that lack of rest means tension and unhappiness.)

Secondly, the child and the adult can explore God's world together. The most potent teaching is finding answers together. The laws of the universe are friendly and exciting and if the adult will match the child in curiosity and eagerness this can be a beautiful road to common understanding.

The third area which the adult and the child can experience together is that of love—love for each other—love for playmates and community neighbors, love for neighbors in Germany, India, China and Africa. We have built roads to overcome the barriers of distance. We can build roads of love which will unite all mankind into one happy family with God as our father.

Dear Father God, make me a better parent.
Teach me to understand my children,
To listen patiently to all they have to say,
And to answer all their questions kindly and truthfully.
Keep me from interrupting them when they have something to tell me.
Help me be as courteous to them as I would have them be to me.
Give me the courage to confess my sins against my children, and to ask of them forgiveness when I know I have done them wrong.
Help me always to do and say only the things
I would be proud to have my children do and say.
May I be fit to be imitated by them.
Forbid that I should laugh at their mistakes.

Understanding of the child and her needs is developed through parent and child sharing many experiences that really matter

May I cease to nag.
When I am out of sorts help me to hold my tongue.
May my hand always be ready to help them when they are in difficult places,
But allow me not to rob them of the opportunity to wait upon themselves, to think, to choose and to make decisions.
Make me fair and just, considerate and companionable to my children so that they not only will have genuine esteem for me but through my influence as a parent they may learn day by day to understand and love thee as their heavenly Father.

We can receive power to achieve by together giving our hearts and lives to God's service—which lifts us above petty irritations and gives us poise, peace and power.

Do You Understand Church Annuities?

H. Spenser Minnich

THE basic idea of the Church Annuity Plan is that the donor makes a gift to a cause and in return receives an agreement which provides a stated income for life. The plan has great merit especially for those who wish to give something to an institution of the church, but feel they need and must have income while they live.

Some people fulfill their stewardship of accumulated possessions by bequests in their wills. The annuity plan is a way by which the donor can execute his own will with respect to the amount that he transfers to a church cause while he is living. Let us answer a few questions that are frequently asked.

1. What is the meaning of the word "annuity"? How does it differ from interest?

The word annuity implies annual payment. The annuity contract stipulates that a gift has been made and the donor in return is to receive a periodic income for life. Interest is compensation for use of money which is to be repaid.

2. What is the rate of annuity?

The annuity income rate is from 3% to 7%. The exact rate is determined by the age of the donor on the date when he makes his gift. This rate continues the same for life and does not change with the advancing age of the donor. Examples of the rate are as follows: age 40, 3%; 60, 4.7%; 74, 6%; 80, 7%. These rates were adopted by Annual Conference.

3. May a donor include another name in the agreement with provision for the survivor to receive the annuity for life?

Yes, many husbands and wives are included in an agreement. Any two persons may be named in an agreement with the survivor receiving the annuity for life. Examples of rates for two people are: ages 60 and 55, 4.2%; 65 and 65, 4.5%; 70 and 70, 4.8%; 75 and 72, 5.1%; 80 and 80, 5.8%; 86 and 85, 6.8%. The maximum rate for either a single agreement or one with two persons is 7%.

4. Are annuity agreements safe?

The annuity agreement is as safe as the institution which issues it. Institutions writing annuity agreements should have a well-established and sound investment policy so that regardless of the longevity of the annuitant and co-annuitant the institution will be in position to pay the annuity. A basic rule in making a gift on the annuity plan would be to assure yourself that the institution issuing the agreement is well managed, will continue in business and will continue to be reliable.

5. How frequently are annuity payments made?

The General Brotherhood Board, the Church of the Brethren colleges and other institutions within the church make payments twice each year, on January 1 and July 1.

6. In what amount are annuity agreements written?

Some persons want to try out the plan and may begin with only $100. The General Brotherhood Board has agreements ranging in amount from $100 to $70,000.

7. How does a prospective donor proceed?

The donor may wish to write to his chosen institution giving his age and a suggested amount of money he would like to give. The institution will then reply giving the rate for his age to his nearest birthday. The money may then be sent with a request that an annuity agreement be issued; whereupon the institution will issue the agreement in duplicate so that the donor may sign both copies, keeping for himself the original and returning the duplicate to the institution. The donor need do nothing further for life except to anticipate the regular receipt of the annuity check.

8. What tax relationship is there with annuities?

There are three relationships. A portion of the gift given for an agreement is regarded by the Treasury Department as a gift and is deductible on an income tax return up to the statuatory limitation of 30% in the year it is given. In this manner an income-tax paying donor may enjoy a reduction in tax in the year he makes his gift. The second tax relationship is, namely, that the annual annuity which the donor receives is partly exempt from tax. In a church annuity only part is subject to tax and the institution issuing the agreement will use the government formula to determine how much of the annual annuity is taxable. In the third place, since the principal is not returnable to the donor no property tax should be assessed.

9. Does the annuity program help people in their estate planning?

There are a number of angles to the annuity plan of benefit to persons planning for loved ones and/or for a charitable cause. The institution writing the agreement, in a sense, serves as a trust company or a trustee for the donor. We mention a few possibilities as follows:

a. A donor may have a child or a friend to whom he does not wish to leave a lump sum at his passing. He makes a gift to the church board with provision for life income payable to the loved one.

b. The donor may have married a second time and the new mate may have children from a previous marriage. In this case the donor might want to provide life income for the surviving mate, but would not want to leave a lump sum which would be inherited by the mate's children.

c. The prospective donor may not be able to transfer money while he is living, but would place an item in his will bequeathing a sum to the church institution, charging the institution to issue to a stated person an annuity agreement for the sum mentioned in the bequest.

Financial Representative, General Brotherhood Board

d. Court, executor and other legal expenses in connection with the settling of an estate often become quite high. This cost can be avoided by distributing the estate, at least a part, while the donor is living. Money transferred to charitable institutions represents a gift and is no longer an asset in the donor's estate at his death.

e. In these days many people are living longer than people did years ago but keenness of mind and ability to invest money at an old age is not assured. Many people protect themselves and their loved ones against the hazards of bad investments in their older years by placing the money with a reliable church institution that will assuredly pay the annuity as stipulated in the agreement.

The annuity plan is often referred to as a triple blessing because of the satisfaction the donor gets in making a gift to the church, because of the assured income for life and, lastly, because of the benefit to the institution of the church.

The Sin of Timidity

Oliver Royer

WHAT is timidity? Webster defines it as being fearful, timorous, cowardly, fainthearted, shrinking or shy. Paul, in writing to Timothy (2 Tim. 1:17 R.S.V.) says, "For God did not give us a spirit of timidity but a spirit of power and love and self-control."

Many of us have been victims of timidity all our lives. Perhaps we have called it "humility," "honor preferring one another" or some other God-given virtue. This was so much easier than accepting the responsibility and doing our real duty.

But Paul makes it plain that the spirit of timidity is not God-given. If not God-given, what is the source of timidity? What God gives is just the opposite, namely, power and love and self-control.

Timidity has always been a barrier to success. Sometimes the small child does not walk for many days after having sufficient strength in his little limbs. When timidity is overcome he wants to run. He becomes fearful in the presence of his best friends. Courage changes his attitude. Timidity is a barrier in social life. " A faint heart never won a fair lady." Because of it many have not ventured in the business world to become the success they might have been. They are satisfied to live mediocre lives. Some have been content to bury the one talent they have instead of investing it bravely and wisely. They will not venture to prepare educationally for a greater life of service.

In our religious life and experience we seem to be especially timid. Why do so many refuse to heed the call to salvation and service? Why are we so slow in venturing into the deeper religious experiences? Someone has said, "No human hand has ever yet reached up to take all that the pierced hand is reaching down to give." Why do people hesitate to attend the prayer meeting? Why refuse to accept definite responsibilities? Why have we not accepted the challenge of personal evangelism and the "first great work of the church," the saving of a lost world?

Paul, in picturing for us the great warfare between the forces of evil and the powers of righteousness (Eph. 6:10-20), uses strong terms to represent the courage we need and must have, but there is no suggestion of timidity. We need to put on the whole armor of God, and stand against the wiles of the devil. Victory is assured, if we have courage to use the divine means available.

When Jesus sent out the twelve (Matt. 10:1ff), he had no place for timidity in his program. He said to them, "Freely ye have received, freely give." He warned them to expect opposition, wolves, arrest and perhaps martyrdom. He assured them of the necessary divine help when coming before the courts for trial. He said to them, "And be not afraid of them that kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell."

In the Great Commission (Matt. 28:20) we have the challenge to save a lost world. Before Jesus gave this commission he stated the authority, saying, "All authority hath been given me in heaven and on earth," And after he gave the challenge he promised, "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." There is no suggestion of timidity in this challenge. Will we accept it with courage and assurance that we may have the victory in Jesus Christ?

Prophetic Realism and the Gospel. John Wick Bowman. Westminster, 1955. 288 pages. $4.75.

Although written with the seminary student especially in the mind, this meaty volume by the well-known author of The Intention of Jesus should be read by every minister of the church. It is an essay in the field of Biblical theology and wrestles with the problem of the right way of viewing Scripture and its teaching. The point of view presented in the book is one with which every thoughful Brethren thinker will find many points of agreement, that of "prophetic realism," set against humanism on the one hand and a narrow apocalypticism on the other. The book consists of three parts: a careful analysis of three current positions in Biblical theology, then a discussion of the theme of the Scripture's prophetic realism and finally the longest section on the content of this prophetic realism. If Brethren ministers are to take their rightful place in the present interdenominational conversation in theology and the interpretation of the Bible they should acquaint themselves with books of this kind, wrestle thoughtfully with their contents and be prepared to share their best thinking with their congregations and with the larger thinking Christian world.—Chalmer E. Faw, Chicago, Ill.

Evangelism in the Sunday Church School. Kenneth L. Cober. Judson, 1955. 95 pages. 50c.

Here is a little book of very great importance. Three of four of the major objectives of Christian education are actually evangelistic goals. Is your church school really winning youth, children and adults to Christian discipleship? If not, it is missing the boat. Every church school teacher ought to buy and study this little book, then "teach for a verdict." While written primarily for Baptists, it speaks to our condition. Dr. Cober, the author, is a Baptist pastor and executive director of the Baptist Division of Christian Education. A must book for church school workers.—Edward K. Ziegler, Roanoke, Va.

Juniata College

Juniata College began classes in its eightieth year with the largest enrollment since 1948. Opening day registration figures showed 664 students enrolled—an increase of nearly 8% over last year's opening total of 612. Of the present total, nearly 221 are listed as new students at Juniata. Dr. Edward T. Horn III, pastor of Trinity Lutheran Church in Germantown, Pa., addressed the student body at the fall convocation.

Highlights of the activities program of the college this year have been: an organ-violin recital by Prof. Donald S. Johnson, organ, and Dr. Jack Brammer, violin, on Sept. 25; the appearance of Grant Reynard,

On Parents Day, Nov. 12, the all-college operetta, Brigadoon, by I. Loewe, was presented in Oller Hall. Brigadoon is a mythological musical play about a town that was condemned to disappear beneath the ground and appear above only once every 100 years. Prof. Donald S. Johnson, head of the music department, and Mr. Gordon H. Felton, of the English department, directed the production.

The Juniata College Catalog for the 1955-56 term was one of three college bulletins to receive an honorable mention in a recent judging of publications at the American College Public Relations Association meeting in Chicago. Dean Morley M. Mays edited the catalog.

Mrs. Charles J. Cherry and Ronald Cherry of Lewistown, Pa., recently established a scholarship fund at Juniata College in memory of the late Charles J. Cherry. The sum of $2,000 will be placed in the endowment fund of the college as a memorial scholarship for young people of the Church of the Brethren of Middle Pennsylvania. An additional $100 has been placed in the library fund for the purchase of books in economics. The scholarship will be known as the Charles J. Cherry Memorial Scholarship. Ronald Cherry is a graduate of Juniata in the class of 1953.

A family of Palestinian refugees began life in America when they moved into an apartment in The Village of Juniata College. Mr. and Mrs. Yousef J. Amash and four children came to the United States sponsored by Juniata College and the Stone Church of the Brethren in Huntingdon, under the Refugee Relief Program of the U. S. State Department. Their trip to Huntingdon was arranged by the Brethren Service Commission. Yousef's brother, Paul Amash, is a junior at Juniata this year.

The social responsibility committee of the Juniata Christian Association is directing two new programs in connection with the organization. Newest of the two is the talent show program which sends groups of student talent to veterans hospitals and state mental hospitals in the area. Students direct this program along wih a faculty adviser. This year two programs have been presented. The second new activity is the week-end work camp which was organized last spring. On Oct .21, members of this project helped paint the interior of the Mt. Olive Baptist church, one of Huntingdon's Negro mission churches. Twenty-one students took part in the activity.

A report on church affiliations at Juniata College shows that there are more Methodists at the college than any other group. The poll shows 132 Methodists, 128 Brethren, 98 Presbyterians, 75 Lutherans and 70 Catholics. The Evangelical United Brethren denomination, with 23 members, and the Baptists, with 20, come next. In addition, there are 22 other denominations represented on campus with from one to 20 students in each group.

Five international students are currently enrolled at Juniata College. They are: Paul Amash, a junior and a native of Jerusalem, Jordan; In Sook Choi, Seoul, Korea, a freshman; Joseph Bozicevic, formerly of Racovica, Croatia, Yugoslavia, and a freshman with advanced standing; Hang Du Kim, of Whang Hei, Korea, a freshman majoring in engineering; and Heng-Feng Lim, just plain Sam to his friends at Juniata, a freshman in the premedical course and a native of Negri Sembilan, Malaya.

Presbyterian Mission Planes Bring Relief to Flood Victims

A major role in bringing relief to Mexico's flood-stricken Yucatan peninsula was played by three planes of the Presbyterian U.S.A. mission there. The planes participated in what is believed to be the greatest airlift operation in Latin-American history—evacuation of 1,300 persons from Ciudad Chetumal, stricken capital of the Quintana Roo state, 175 miles south of Merida. Only 40 of the city's 1,500 houses were left standing after Hurricane Janet was followed by a tidal wave that swept over the city. The twin catastrophes took a toll of more than 500 lives.

Sales of the Revised Standard Version which was published three years ago have now passed the 3,600,000 mark. In addition, there are more than 2,600,000 Revised Standard Version New Testaments and more than 800,000 children's Bibles also in the Revised Standard Version. The R.S.V. is now used exclusively for Sunday schools of fifteen denominations with an enrollment of 15,000,000 in the United States and Canada. Five other denominations, including the Church of the Brethren, use the R.S.V. and the King James for parallel study.

National Council Board Adopts Statement on Violation of Civilized Code

At the recent meeting of the General Board of the National Council of Churches prolonged discussion was given to the recent kidnap-murder of Emmett Till, a Chicago Negro youth in Mississippi, and similar violations of the civilized code. The board adopted a statement placing responsibility for "violation of human personality on racial grounds" squarely on the shoulders of the whole nation. The board said, "Tragic events, such as those which have recently occurred in Mississippi, have produced anguish not only among their immediate victims, but among Christians everywhere. Especially grieved are those who are giving themselves in heroic devotion to the realization of human justice."

In another major act the board authorized the National Council to make representations to the U.S. Secretary of State and the U.S. delegation to the UN to help arouse concern for the Greek minority in Turkey, and the wholesale destruction of Greek Orthodox churches in that country in recent rioting.

Study Shows Change in Status of Clergy Salaries

Clergymen dropped from the upper thirty per cent of salaried workers in the United States to the lowest thirty per cent between 1939 and 1949. This was disclosed in the report of a study released by the U. S. Census Bureau. Out of 118 occupations studied, the ministry was one of only 24 that failed to register a gain of at least 100 per cent in income during that decade.

Suicide Increase in Sweden Due to Declining Christian Influence

An increase in suicide attempts in Sweden has been ascribed by several leading daily papers there to a decline of Christian influence among the people. According to reports, the number of suicides in the country has doubled in the last two years. There are 1,200 attempted suicides a year. The latter figure is greater than the annual total of traffic fatalities. Unhappy marriages or love affairs rank first as motives for suicide attempts. Next come alcoholism and psychic disorders. Economic difficulties or disease are third on the list of causes.

Fourteen major denominations in the United States and Canada will carry on this winter and during 1956 a campaign to raise $1,882,000 for additional dormitories and other building facilities for the International Christian University, located in Tokyo, Japan.

American comic book readers spend more on comics each year than the entire expenditure in the U.S. for elementary and secondary school books, according to a survey by the University of California. The survey also shows that twenty-five per cent of American adults who are high school graduates read comics as do sixteen per cent of college graduates and twelve per cent of the nation's schoolteachers.

Increased atheistic propaganda is being spread in Soviet-annexed Latvia, Estonia and Lithuania, according to indications noted on local radio broadcasts in these Baltic countries. Hardly a day passes without the broadcast of an antireligious program or lecture. Radio reviews of the press make it clear that many articles of an atheistic nature are being published by newspapers.

Giving to Protestant churches is continuing to increase. In 1954 contributions reported by forty-seven Protestant and two Eastern Orthodox bodies totaled $1,687,921,729, an increase of $145,000,000 over 1953.

The new Alexander Mack school at Schwarzenau was built with the help of the gift of 60,000 Deutsche Marks from the Church of the Brethren. This gift made possible the construction of a building large enough to care for future needs, instead of a building adequate only for the present

European Workers Meet in Conference

Kassel, Germany
September 6, 1955

Dear Friends:

I must tell you about our conference while the inspiration is still fresh in my mind. From Aug. 29 to Sept. 4 about seventy Brethren Service workers from Germany, England, Austria, Greece and Turkey gathered at Brethren House, Kassel, for the tenth annual European Brethren Service conference.

It is impossible to convey to you the wonderful type of fellowship which took place unless you have yourself experienced such a gathering. I'm sure we tasted of heaven in this priceless sharing with others of such kindred ideals and hopes. We would have wished we could stay together indefinitely, had we not known that the thing which made our fellowship so precious was the very fact that we were bound to part ways and to spread further the message of Christian love and reconciliation.

The conference was packed with moments of inspiration and deep consecration. We were thankful to have with us such leaders as Bro. Harold Row, executive secretary of the Brethren Service Commission; Bro. William Beahm, dean of Bethany Biblical Seminary, and his wife; Bro. John Metzler, executive secretary of the European surplus commodities program of the World Council of Churches; and Bro. M. R. Zigler, director of Brethren Service in Europe. Bro. Beahm led us each morning in an instructive and thought-provoking study of the Book of Hebrews. He also spoke to us on Faith and Order, and Bro. Metzler spoke on Life and Works. Together these speeches helped give us a balanced view of what our religion should mean. Bro. Zigler inspired us in a great speech on our conference theme, The Majesty of His Cause, to strive in the coming year to "copy God" and to experiment with Christian love much as a scientist experiments with chemicals. A moving part of the conference was the program, This I Believe, in which each volunteer shared with the group for five minutes his beliefs, his heartaches and his aspirations.

The highpoint of our conference was the preparatory service and communion on Saturday night. Somehow the whole conference had been moving toward that event. After we had confessed to God our shortcomings, we were granted freedom from ourselves and were then open for God's spirit to come within us. Sensing our frailties and weakness, we determined to turn our lives over more completely to the guidance and care of our Master. The feet-washing, the love feast, the taking of bread and wine, and the sacred kiss of peace, which is a special kind of handshake used by the church in South India, symbolized our cleansing of all ill feelings toward one another and our joining together in a brotherhood of love dedicated to extending through the world Christ's spirit of peace and brotherhood.

On Sunday our group experienced the joy of home-coming as we traveled to Schwarzenau, birthplace of the Church of the Brethren, to present the gift of 60,000 German Marks from the Brethren for the new Alexander Mack school there. We were impressed by the fact that the community had one hundred invitations to dinner for only seventy persons and by the genuine hospitality in the homes. Many of us will visit our family whenever we return to Schwarzenau. This personal contact with the people of Schwarzenau is something which has existed only to a small degree prior to this time. The true thankfulness of the people for this gift was well expressed in the long program following the presentation. The length of the program and the presence of men of the radio (a new occurrence in Schwarzenau) were both indications of the importance which they attached to this occasion. I am grateful that the Brethren, in establishing a memorial at Schwarzenau in preparation for the approaching 250th anniversary, saw fit to make their memorial a living one, a memorial that is also an investment in the children of Schwarzenau.

Continue to remember us with your prayers and your support. Remember that you are the roots of this tree and that without your help we would be of little value.

How to Observe Human Rights Day

Ralph E. Smeltzer
Director of Social Education

ON DECEMBER 10, 1948, the General Assembly of the United Nations meeting in Paris adopted and proclaimed the historic Universal Declaration of Human Rights "as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations, to the end that every individual and every organ of society, keeping this Declaration constantly in mind, shall strive by teaching and education to promote respect for these rights and freedoms and by progressive measures, national and international, to secure their universal and effective recognition and observance, both among the peoples of member states themselves and among the peoples of territories under their jurisdiction." The Declaration is a statement of objectives. It is not a treaty and involves no legal obligation. To celebrate its adoption, the General Assembly in 1950 asked that in future years Dec. 10 be set aside as Human Rights Day.

Each year the President of the United States issues a proclamation calling on the people of this country to observe Dec. 10 as Human Rights Day by engaging in an educational program on human rights in each community. The purpose is to make the Universal Declaration of Human Rights a living document in your community.

What Are Human Rights?

The President's Committee on Civil Rights lists four essential rights: (1) the right of safety and security of person, (2) the right of citizenship, (3) the equality of opportunity and (4) freedom of conscience and expression. The Bill of Rights (the first ten amendments of the Constitution) sets forth the basic freedoms: freedom of religion, of speech, of press and of assembly; trial by jury, habeas corpus; protection against cruel and excessive punishment; and equality before the law.

Why Should the Church Be Interested in Human Rights Day?

Christian churches have a special interest in Human Rights Day because the Christian faith provides a great bulwark for the protection of human rights and freedoms. Contrariwise, it is out of our very faith itself that the recognition for human rights and freedoms has grown.

The Church of the Brethren, throughout its history, has had a special interest in human rights and freedoms, especially in the rights of conscience. It is, therefore, fitting that each year on the Sunday nearest Dec. 10 Brethren congregations should observe Human Rights Day and lift up this emphasis.

Suggestions for Observing Human Rights Day

To the pastor:

Preach a sermon on human rights. Universal Bible Sunday always comes near to Human Rights Day so you might combine the two emphases and preach on The Biblical Basis of Human Rights, or The Bible and Human Rights.

To the church school superintendent and teachers:

Apply the Sunday-school lesson to problems of human rights in your community, in your nation and in other nations. List violations of human rights. Discuss ways to correct these violations. Plan some appropriate class or church action to correct these violations. State clearly the Biblical basis for such action.

If enough interest develops in the subject, the class might plan to set aside the uniform Sunday-school lessons and spend four Sundays or a quarter on the relation of the Christian faith to human rights. Appropriate elective units are available from the Social Education Department, Brethren Service Commission, 22 S. State St., Elgin, Ill.

To the planners of the Sunday evening program, the Brethren service commission or social education and action committees, the leaders of women's work, men's work and youth work:

Plan a panel, a forum, a movie, a speaker or a drama on The Church and Human Rights in This Community. Invite the surrounding community to attend.

Plan a Sunday evening school on human rights (four or more Sunday evenings). Here are two suggested plans:

A. Launch a study series on The Bible and Human Rights by showing an unusually stirring documentary film, The Challenge (35 minutes; 16 mm. sound; available from the March of Time Forum Films, 369 Lexington Ave., New York 17, N. Y.

The Challenge is a picture-dramatization of the report of the President's Committee on Civil Rights. A wanton murder of a Negro citizen who has just discharged his civic duty by voting at the polls sends a photographer-reporter team into a nation-wide investigation. They begin with the four essential rights stated by the President's committee: the right of safety and security of person, the right of citizenship, equality of opportunity, and freedom of conscience and expression. Their fact finding takes them to every part of the country and brings to light many infringements on these four rights, but also some examples of social progress and the good work being done by schools, churches and civic groups.

This three-reel sound film ends with the story of civil rights still unfinished business—a challenge to all Americans!

Following the film, divide the group into small groups of ten to fifteen persons to study the four essential freedoms. These will meet for three or four sessions, using as their study texts the Bible; To Secure These Rights, a reprint of the Report of the President's Committee on Civil Rights, the findings of fifteen American citizens who investigated the state of liberty in the United States (order copies from the Department of Social Education, Brethren Service Commission, 10c); The Bible and Human Rights by Kathleen MacArthur (order from Brethren Publishing House, 60c).

B. Use the Universal Declaration of Human Rights as the text for study and fact-finding groups.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights was adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations on Dec. 10, 1948. It is unique in the world's history because the basic rights it declares are intended to apply to all people everywhere. It has been recognized throughout most of the world as a universal standard toward which all nations can work; it is a yardstick for American communities, too, against which we can measure local laws, community practices and personal and intergroup relations. (Secure copies of this document from the Department of Social Education, Brethren Service Commission, single copy, free.)

Read the Declaration with its preamble and thirty articles. Discuss two of the following questions at each class session:

1. Do all the thirty articles in the Declaration apply to our community? What articles do not apply?

2. What are the differences between human rights in our nation and the provision of the Declaration?

3. Compare ideas of religious liberty in our country with Article 18. What are the differences?

4. Contrast and compare the economic social rights in Articles 22 to 25 with the traditional individual personal rights.

5. Should our country give up some sovereignty in order to ratify a covenant of human rights which would give some organ of the United Nations the power of investigation and court action if human rights were violated in this country or if we failed to live up to the Declaration's provisions?

6. In what specific ways can church leaders help all members of the church to know about the Declaration of Human Rights?

7. What are we doing as Christian citizens to safeguard civil liberty for all residents of our town? What can the church do to help the institutions of the community to measure up to the human rights we are advocating for other people or for Soviet Russia, for example?

8. What is the Biblical basis for church action for improving human rights?

Along with the study, assign persons or groups to field trips to investigate the local status of human rights in the police court or sheriff's office, the city or county jail, the town or city council and the public schools. They should learn how laws are administered in the town; whether there is equal justice under law, what the public schools do about brotherhood and intergroup relations; what other churches and civic groups are doing. Each person or group will report findings to the general group.

Co-operate with Other Churches and the Community in Observing Human Rights Day

Initiate or co-operate in interdenominational and community projects during the week in which Dec. 10 falls. Community meetings and school assemblies offer good opportunities. Include persons of different races and religions. Ask participants to tell what the Declaration of Human Rights means to them.

Here are UNESCO's suggestions for church and community co-operation. Some are appropriate for Human Rights Day, others for long-range educational programs.

1. "Ministers and church organizations can join community leaders, college and university presidents, school superintendents, officials in labor and industry in statements urging the community to support the standards of the Declaration—and pledging their support.

2. "Churches and synagogues can show the relation of the Declaration to their centuries-long emphasis upon the dignity and common kinship of all human beings.

3. "Church leaders can urge newspapers, radios and television commentators to editorialize on the Declaration and its meaning to the world, the nation and the community and to feature the progress that has been made to date, the problems yet unsolved.

4. "Local stores and business houses can utilize the human rights theme to promote constructive human relations within the community. They can arrange displays themselves or donate advertising and window space to others.

5. "Parent-teacher groups can discuss how these principles are taught in the schools and how they can be 'lived' in the home.

6. "Libraries and museums can arrange exhibitions. Libraries can classify and expand their collections of human rights materials for wider community use and work with churches and local business firms on display of posters, books and documents on human rights.

7. "Churches, civic clubs, women's groups, etc., can write their senators during the week in which Dec. 10 falls, urging the ratification by the United States Senate of the Covenant of Human Rights completed by the United Nations Commission on Human Rights."

In addition to the curriculum items mentioned above, the following pieces give general background material and are essential for the study of human rights. They are available from the Brethren Service Commission.

Women's Institute at Anklesvar

Kathryn Kiracofe

TUESDAY to Friday, May 31 to June 4, were some of the hottest days of the summer, but they were also days of much activity at the girls' school at Anklesvar, India. The second annual institute for women was in session. The group this year, eighteen women, was from five different churches. All the women were educated, some only fourth grade, while others were trained teachers. All were village women, some doing Bible women's work, some the wives of mission workers, some wives of farmers and one a doctor's wife. It made a diversified group, but there was complete harmony in purpose and co-operation throughout the institute.

It was vacation time in the girls' school so the hostel was available and provided ample room and facilities for the women to sleep, eat, work, worship and play. One of the local women, with helpers, did the cooking. The women helped with serving the food and kept their own rooms clean.

The morning program began at 7:15 with a forty-five-minute period of Bible study. Hiravatiben Moses, a local Christian, used illustrations from women of the Bible to give a vision of womanhood at its highest in fulfillment of God's purpose. The remainder of the morning was spent in classes in health, child care, family diet and home management. We had leaders from the Wesleyan Church, the University of Baroda and the Rural Service Center in Anklesvar.

Activities began again after tea in the afternoon. An hour was given to discussion. A question box was handy for the women's questions. These with other questions from the floor were the basis for the lively discussion period. Following this period Laura Sewell, one of our missionaries, led the women in games. The common attitude that play is only for children was laid aside and the women entered into the games with great enthusiasm and laughter.

Filmstrips were used in the evenings to stimulate our thinking on hookworm, itch, drinking water, sore eyes, tuberculosis, flies, malaria, and cholera.

The last evening five women represented the group in telling how they hoped to implement in their villages what they had learned at the institute. Each of the women were asked to write five things she felt most needed to be done in her own village. Here is a summary of their papers:

1. Teach women to read and write.
2. Give mothers help on how to care for their children when they are sick.
3. Explain to the women why they should go to a doctor at time of confinement.
4. Teach the women the need for cleanliness.
5. Show women the harm of flies, lice, bedbugs, fleas and mosquitoes and how they can get rid of these insects.
6. Teach the women how to care for a T.B. patient in their homes.
7. Teach the women how to sew and make clothing for their families.
8. Encourage the mothers to send their girls to school.
9. Teach the women what foods to give their small children.
10. Teach the women what foods they should give to a sick person in the home.
11. Teach the children games that foster good habits, co-operation, and friendliness. Also teach the women to play games.

12. Teach the women the need of having a separate place for their animals, rather than having the animals sleeping in the room with the family.

13. Help the women to give up their superstitious practices.

14. Teach the women how to care for their children so they will not get itch, colds and other ailments, and what to do when they do get these diseases.

15. Teach the women the importance of raising chickens so their children can have eggs to eat.

16. Teach the women the need of using small patches of idle land and how to fertilize it for garden.

17. Tell the women about credit and co-operative societies so they can encourage their husbands to make use of these societies and learn to save money.

18. Teach the women the harm of liquor, tobacco, opium and snuff.

19. Teach the women the need of co-operation in improving their villages.

20. Show the women how to keep the wells clean so the water will not become unfit for drinking.

The women left the institute anticipating the joy of improvement in their own homes from what they had learned, and also of passing these things on to other women of their villages. As we think back on the institute every memory of it gives a feeling of satisfaction, but we realize that what we accomplished is only first steps in what we really wish to do among the rural women. Any program of rural improvement must include the women. The mother is the center of the home. Any program, to be lasting, must begin and continue in the home.

The motto of our institute last year and again this year was "The Home Is the Foundation of All Improvement." This we believe and to this end we are working.

Every Good Gift

Marianne Michael
Nigeria, West Africa

CHRISTMAS comes but once a year? Not if you live in Garkida. Gift-giving has no season and the thermometer may be soaring or the clouds may be practically disolving all about us when a lovely gift appears—not wrapped in tissue or tied with ribbons, it is true, but coming with all the love that gift-giving makes so precious.

There may be a timid little "salaam" outside and outside is a little schoolboy, barefooted, shy, perhaps a bit unwashed but two eyes smiling anyway as he greets me. At first I may not guess his errand but before long his eyes have given him away and sure enough a hand that has been hidden behind his back now comes out with two little eggs. "A little gift for you, princess." "But such a lovely gift, my friend. You mean it is for me?" "It is nothing; perhaps if there were three or if I could have found five, but this is nothing." "It is precious to me and you picked the thing I wanted most of all. How thoughtful of you."

Another time there is a lady with a bundle of wood. "Oh, you came selling wood this morning?" "No, this wood is not for sale, this is a gift for you." "You mean you brought this all for me?" "It is nothing; perhaps if there were two bundles, or if this were larger. . ." "But this is large and I know that the sun is hot and the wood is far away; you know how this pleases me." "This is nothing, but perhaps is will warm your little ones some cool morning."

Again here comes a friend of many years, perhaps not seen for a long time, and under one arm he has a chicken bound. "How are things this morning, friend?" "The day is pleasant to me because I came out especially to bring you this gift." "Such a big gift as this, all for me?" "It is so little, perhaps if it were a big rooster it might be good, but such as it is, I came with it." "It is a beautiful chicken and it is precious to me because of your thoughtfulness. May God bless you richly."

There is always a bit of ceremony connected with a first gift from a woman because is it not simply a gift, but a covenant of friendship, and not to be accepted lightly. This may be a gourd, beautifully decorated, containing food—rice, peanuts, guinea corn, okra or maize. To one who knows the amount of effort it takes to wrest a crop from the soil with two hands and a hoe, one stands in awe at any gift shared so generously out of their little.

Truly "every good and perfect gift comes from above." When we give because we love each other, how perfect is that gift.

It's Worth a Second Look

That is what the Brethren say after seeing "Valley of the Sun" —a 16mm sound film in color. What can a small Christian church and school accomplish for Christ in India's small villages? One answer is found in the "Valley of the Sun," where Shalini and her husband carry the light of the Christian faith for all to see. Her life story is climaxed when the wealthy young landlord asks, "Shalini, teach me how to pray." A true story of Brethren missions in India. Showing time, 25 minutes. Rental, $7.00, from the Visual Education Service, 22 S. State St., Elgin, Illinois.

Out of the Mailbag

Robert and Mary Louise Swank write from Nigeria: On Sunday, Sept. 11, a new church building was dedicated at Bila, a village twelve miles from Marama. Ivan Eikenberry preached the morning message. Monroe Good baptized a man and wife, both deaf and dumb, and in the afternoon we had a communion service. It was estimated that over 1,200 people were present for the morning service of which only eighty were baptized church members. I feel that we have a great opportunity here.

At the present time the Marama church is supporting twenty-nine classes of religious instruction and thirty-four C. R. I. teachers. That is quite a load for the Nigerian church to carry. From these classes come the new churches like the one at Bila. There is much to do!

Good Neighbors Begin at Home

Ralph A. Felton

THE question, "Who is my neighbor?" seems as much of a puzzle to many today as it was to that "certain lawyer" who asked it of Jesus. But you would find it answered in the Panther Creek church community in Dallas County, Iowa.

In answering it, the people of this church community are also meeting one of the acute problems of our time. It is how to enable young couples to get started on farms in this high-cost period. In the way of harsh difficulties they travel one of the Jericho roads of today.

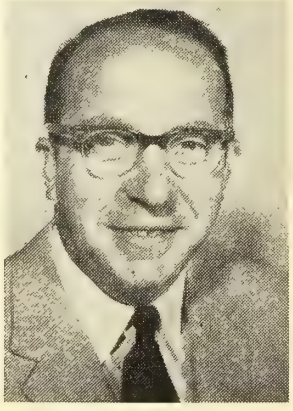
The Panther Creek Church of the Brethren called its first full-time pastor, Paul Miller, in 1944. In the eleven years since, he has gone about his parish carrying the gospel of neighborliness into homes and barns and fields.

A year after he began his work, the young men began coming back from World War II. A placement committee was named to help them rent or buy farms. For ten years this committee has been busy locating farms that are for sale, appraising the land and helping to obtain purchase funds.

Bob and Doris Emmert were the first couple helped. The placement committee located an eighty-acre farm for sale and got a loan for them from the endowment funds of their denomination. A church member lent Bob some brood sows. The pastor and men of the church helped paint the house, put a new roof on it and later built a new corncrib. Doris teaches a Sunday-school class and plays the piano for the church service. Their four children have increased the Sunday-school enrollment.

Next Maurice and Darlene Messamer were helped to purchase a 120-acre farm, with funds borrowed from a doctor. They are not finding it hard to keep up their payments, at 4 per cent interest, from their 100-bushel-to-the-acre corn yields. Maurice is on the church finance board and Darlene, in addition to teaching a Sunday-school class, is head of the young married women's organization. This program of helping their young couples yields loyal and active workers in all phases of the church's activities.

The placement committee has helped fourteen young couples to get started in the community. Sometimes it advises them to rent and not buy if the price is too high. Members of this church realize that in one short generation they can lose their church—two other nearby churches have been closed—if their land is bought up by speculators. By helping to keep their own young people in the parish and by their general spirit of neighborliness, they have increased the membership of their open-country church to 300.



"I like our community because it is church-centered and family-centered," said Eva York. "We do things together as families, church families."

Verle and Eva York first bought a forty-acre farm, paid for it and now have added eighty more acres. They are among the most active members of the church.

This placement committee, members of which rotate from year to year, represents only one phase of the spirit of neighborliness of the Panther Creek church.

When one of the farmers in the community had to have an operation on his knee, his neighbors finished his corncrib and picked and cribbed his corn. One of the young farmers had polio. The neighbors moved in with their tractors, disked his ground, sowed his oats and planted his grass seed.

Another farmer suffered a broken leg. Thirty of his neighbors picked and cribbed his corn. The wives came at noon with dinners. This church once sent one of its members to Washington. While he was away, fifty neighbor-owned tractors plowed his fields. That is more men than many churches can get out for a chicken dinner.

Four men from this church were sent to Europe and seven to Asia to take livestock to needy foreign farmers as a part of the very fine and practical farmer-supported Heifer Project, Inc. Neighbors cared for their crops while these men were away on their mission of extended neighborliness.

During the past year this open-country church has built an $85,000 addition. Four fifths of the labor was donated by the members and three fourths of the cost has already been paid. On the new sanctuary, facing the road, is an electrically lighted cross. Airplane pilots that fly over at night look for it.

The question the lawyer in the temple asked Jesus will always confront us. This Iowa church community is showing us how it can be answered in these modern times of tractors and high-priced farmland. It is also building on the only secure foundations the rural church can lay.

"O Where Are Kings and Empires Now"

ONLY SUCH stones as these ruins of a palatial villa still stand where there was once a prosperous city of more than a million population. The city was ancient Carthage, the capital of an empire along the Mediterranean, a city of such wealth and power that a Roman senator, Cato, never made a speech in the senate without concluding, "Carthage must be destroyed."

The Romans succeeded in plundering the city. Later they made it a colony, but new invaders came and Carthage fell to the Vandals once and later to the Arabs. Then it disappeared from history. Now its ruins, like those of many an ancient city, stand as grim reminders that civilizations also "have their day and cease to be." Even the presence of a flourishing Christian movement could not guarantee this great city against destruction. But the church of Tertullian and Cyprian and Augustine lives on. "O where are kings and empires now of old that went and came? But, Lord, thy church is praying yet, a thousand years the same."

READERS WRITE . . . to the editor

The Gospel Messenger welcomes letters commenting on editorials, articles and news. Letters should be brief and brotherly.

More Discussion

"Can we be too broad-minded in our giving?" in your editorial, "Careful in Our Stewardship," (Oct. 22) is a question well raised. "Good works" of every description and every stripe call us—CARE, Community Chest, hospitals, peace organizations, not to mention political parties, crusades and the radio preachers who will "go off the air unless we write them at once." I would like to see more discussion of this problem in your columns by some of our brethren who are in the stewardship field.—William Nyce, Lansdale, Pa.

Appreciation

I wish to express my appreciation of the column in the Messenger, "The Family Counselor." I am thankful that our church is making use of those who have the understanding and wisdom, the Christian concern and sympathy for helping to solve some of life's problems that perplex our good people. If these people face situations in which Satan is seeking their downfall, this is all the more reason why our church should provide sound, warm Christian counsel instead of sending them to seek help from secular newspaper columns.—Rose L. Cooper, Calhan, Colo.

Better Use

I am glad for Bro. Root's letter (Oct. 22). I too have read this piece for Sept. 10. I think the space used for Family Counselor could be put to better use. Let the advice needed be given by private correspondence and the space used in harmony with all our upbuilding.—I. C. Snavely, Vermontville, Mich.

No Better Place

In regards to the letter in the Messenger of Oct. 22, Out of Place, I can go along with Mr. John W. Root. It seems to me it is a shame we need such articles in our church paper and it seems too bad that so much time needs be spent in answering such letters though we must look these things square in the face. Then we will know where all such things come from. We can just take a look around us. Then we will have a good look at our town and our community, where our children are living. When we as parents either do not have time, or will not take time, to give our children the kind of family life they should have in the home—this type of thing is to be expected.

Now it seems to me that there is no better place for our children to turn than to those who have seen fit to use the experience and knowledge in print in our Messenger where people can get a look at the problems some persons have to face. So in the light of all the things our young people come in contact with I, for one, feel that these counselors, the Messenger, the editor and staff at Elgin are doing a grand work. If they can save some one from sin as I am sure they do, may the Lord bless them and the work they are doing.—R. R. LaRue, Rodney, Mich.

A Conscientious Objector

He had done no wrong whatsoever. He wished merely to do right as his conscience, directed by the word and will of his Lord, led him. It is true he became a CO a little late. Anyhow the judge gave him time in prison. He was sent to Mill Point, W. Va., 107 miles from Charleston.

For the first several months his work was in the electric shop. After that he worked in the office of the captain.

He reports that there were divine services held each Sunday. There were a number of Amish brothers and Jehovah's Witnesses present with him in prison, but these did not attend public worship. Our brother attended divine service and did what he could as a worshiper.

This is Oct. 19, 1955. Three weeks ago Clifton Campbell was called into the parole office and was told he now has freedom. Today he was freed and his good wife brought him by our home. He told us he wishes to do his two years alternative service, and "in five days I am due to be present in Bethany Hospital, Chicago, to begin work as an orderly."

In prison he says, "I was taking school work by correspondence to get my high school work finished, and also I took a course from Bethany Seminary, as did my wife."

In prison? Yes, but not for any high crime. He was was there for living up to his conscience. Is your conscience clear and easy? His is. I suggest when you meet him you do not look down to him, but up to him. God bless this young man and his good wife.—I. S. and Effie V. Long, Harrisonburg, Va.

Could I who move within my kitchen sphere find heaven's very glory hiding here among the pots and pans, the mops and brooms in this, the very lowliest of rooms?

His Kingdom in My Kitchen

If his kingdom on earth exists for me at all, it must exist not in some distant Utopia but right where I live.

Ernestine Hoff Emerick

I

DEAR Father, today I asked of you a great thing. At least, it is of great importance to me. This morning as soon as I awoke, I asked you to show me your kingdom in my kitchen. I suppose it was more in the nature of a defiant challenge than a prayer. But it was, nevertheless, a sincere request, as I have sought for it there under my own power for a great while without success. And so in my extremity, I began this day by belatedly asking for your revelation on the matter.

Lord, make this day a little gem
That sparkles in time's diadem,
A nugget whose intrinsic worth
Surpasses any joys of earth.

Forgive me, Father, but my kitchen activities have too often seemed to me not unlike the monotonous pacings of a caged animal. And sometimes I have felt as if I were marooned on a spiritual plateau that bore a striking resemblance to the barren, uninteresting surface of my ironing board or at other times as if my state of mind had reached to depths as gloomy and distasteful as the contents of my mop bucket. How often I craved the refreshing lift of a mountaintop experience, but the only mountaintop I could see was the mountain of dirty dishes stacked high in the kitchen sink.

Does there live and breathe a housewife who has not at some time murmured ever so faintly at her lot? Certainly there must be others like me whose murmurings have occasionally reached the point of rumblings and grumblings. Perhaps its being such an urgent problem to me, Father, is your way of nudging me to delve into it and gain some insights to share with other women.

Surely, I have thought, my Lord must have some more exalted work in mind for me than this! Or could these routine duties be simply kitchen curtains across the windows of heaven, which, if drawn aside, would afford breath-taking glimpses into your kingdom?

Thine is the kingdom—can it somehow be
That what is thine can also be for me?

Could I who move within my kitchen sphere
Find heaven's very glory hiding here
Among the pots and pans, the mops and brooms
In this, the very lowliest of rooms?
Our Lord has said that he who serves is best—
Perhaps the housewife's realm is kingdom-blest.

Yes, Father? So it might just possibly be pride which led me to feel that I was above these humble tasks. Well, then, push back those kitchen curtains and reveal to me the spiritual meaning in each task.

This morning as the warmth of my breakfast coffee permeated my whole being, bracing and reassuring me, you reminded me that drinking in the warmth of your love could do the same for my spirit each morning. Thus, with a little "sanctified imagination," the simple act of sipping a cup of coffee can represent a spiritual preparation for the day's eventualities.

Scraping the plates, clearing the table, washing the dishes, polishing the sink—these all were transformed under your magic touch from a bit of routine drudgery into a symbolic cleansing of my spirit for the day, washing away the leftover impurities of pride, resentment, anxiety, anger, self-pity and doubt.

So now I had been filled with the warmth of your love and cleansed of hinderances that would prevent it from flowing through me to others. Then I was ready for that bit of leaven which is a necessity for all bread-makers—that moment of devotion.

A bit of leaven helps a woman rise
To view her daily tasks through spirit-eyes.

When I contemplated what was going to be required of me today, it was comforting to remember that your prophet listed just three things: "And what does the Lord require of you but to do justice, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with your God?" (Micah 6:8). I am so glad there is nothing in your Book which says that a housewife must accomplish in one day all that is on her list of tasks awaiting to be done. For, when I sought your orders for the day, I realized as usual that there was an impossible number of things to do in the alloted hours. But instead of attempting them all as has been my custom, with the usual chaotic state of mind resulting, this time I said, "Father, this is to be your day, and you can't get through to me if I am hurried and irritable. Show me what is most urgent and what can wait." So the laundry will be tomorrow's task, although the clothes hamper is groaning under the volume of garments soiled on our vacation last week. And the marketing will also wait, although Tabbypuss could say with certainty that as far as her rations are concerned, the cupboard is bare.

And so three of your morning hours were spent in mimeographing and addressing 150 cards announcing the church women's picnic next Thursday, for they must be in the afternoon mail. Be very near to us then, Father, as we fellowship together and seek first your kingdom in the great outdoors.

This afternoon as I sat under a tree in the backyard husking sweet corn for the freezer, I was made to wonder what would be revealed if external appearances could be stripped from people of my acquaintance—yes, and myself too—leaving our inmost souls in view. The ears of corn, aside from size, looked much alike on the outside, but inside there was no such uniformity. Some were only partially developed with much room left for growth. Some looked shriveled and withered as if they had lacked life-giving water. Some were well-developed on one side but had a neglected area on the other side. Some were nubbins, stunted with no prospect for growth. Some were blighted with the loathsome smut,a hideous, discolored, cancerous infection in which the kernels develop in an abnormal and distorted manner. What a joy to find an ear properly matured, filled out in plump even rows

The Board Serves the Brotherhood

THE Church of the Brethren owes a debt of gratitude to the twenty-five members of its General Brotherhood Board. These representatives, who are elected by Annual Conference to guide the planning and administration of our entire Brotherhood program, serve without pay in a capacity that makes heavy demands upon their time and energy.

A few weeks ago the Board met in Elgin for four busy days. In preparation for their conference sessions they were required to study an agenda that filled 138 mimeographed pages. The agenda was lengthy because in these November meetings the Board and its commissions review the work of each department under their supervision.

The Board seeks to exert careful stewardship as it oversees the spending of one and a quarter million dollars of the Lord's money every year. Its members recognize their responsibility to God and to Annual Conference as well as their need to represent the local churches and institutions with which they are most familiar. Their discussions, though often animated, are brotherly in spirit. Though their wisdom is not infallible, they exercise wise judgment in making decisions that are significant for the welfare of the church.

Our readers would be well advised to share their deepest concerns with board members in their area. In return board members can be helpful in giving a fair interpretation of Brotherhood actions. Lest our readers are unacquainted with the personnel of the Board we are happy to name them as we solicit for them your prayers and your support:

Where the Money Goes

DO YOU know how your government plans to spend your tax dollar? According to the appropriations approved by the last session of Congress, around 60 cents of each dollar will support the current military program, another 10 cents is needed for interest on the national war debt and about 7.5 cents goes for veterans' services and benefits. This means that more than three fourths of our federal spending will go for present and past wars.

In contrast to these huge military expenditures, consider the few cents of each tax dollar that provide nonmilitary services. Figure about 1.8 cents for foreign aid, technical assistance and United Nation's projects, 2 cents for control and development of natural resources, a little over one cent for agriculture, 4 cents for health, education and social security.

Some Christians find it easy to relieve their consciences about paying war taxes by thinking they are rendering to Caesar what is properly Caesar's. But did Jesus intend to imply that Caesar could have whatever he demanded and for whatever purposes he wished? Do we not have some responsibility for seeing that our government, of which we are a part, invests its resources in constructive activities? And doesn't it seem rather hypocritical, if not a little blasphemous, for a nation that spends three-fourths of its income for armies and armaments to assert on its coins and stamps that "in God we trust."

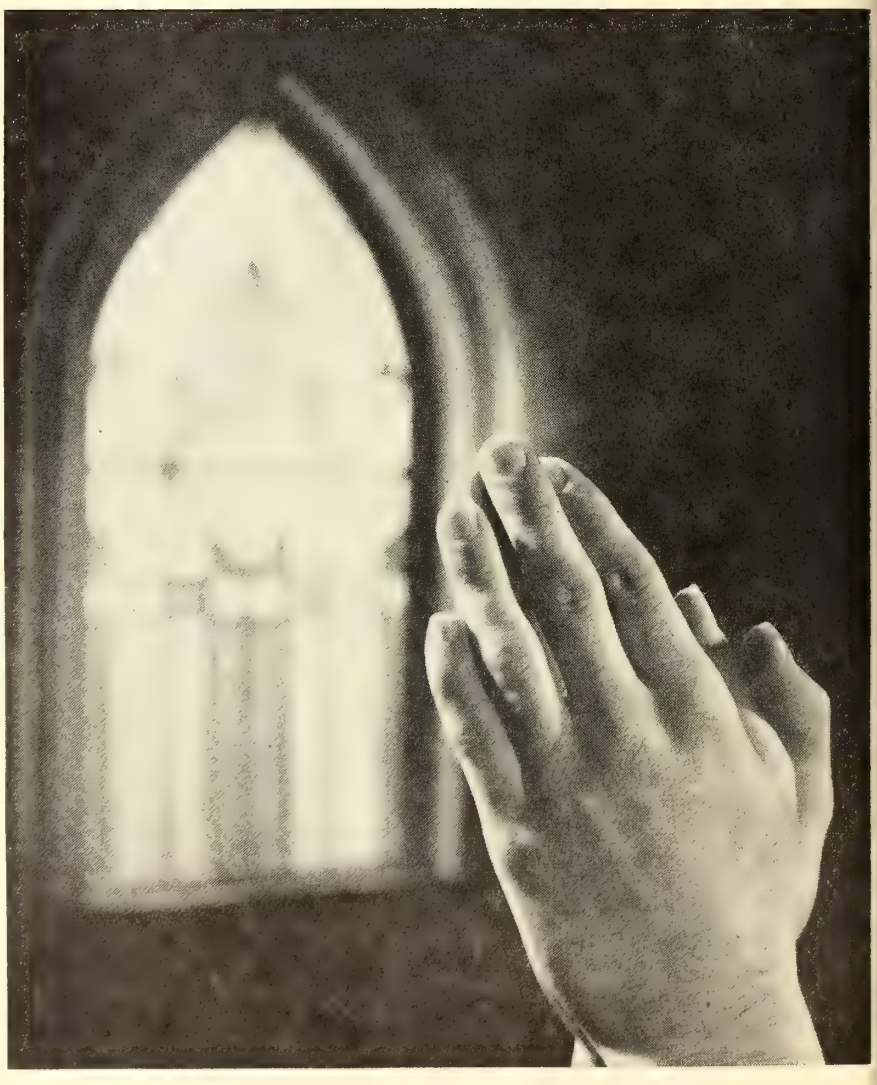
If we must render such a large amount of our income to Caesar, let us at least demand a better accounting of his stewardship.—K.M.

The Christian Core

BOB DAVENPORT is a student at the University of California in Los Angeles. He is one of several players on the U.C.L.A. football team who are regarded by their coach as being the "religious core" of their outfit. Coach Red Sanders says that the selfless attitude of such players contributes to teamwork and morale.

In practically every place where people work or play there should be the same opportunity for Christians to be the core, to be at the center of creative activity. Christians can be the sparks that ignite wholesome movements for good.—K.M.

The early disciples turned the world upside down; so can we, if we open our lives to the power of the Holy Spirit that can help us stop the evil and go forward in winning the world for Christ.



Power to Stop--Power to Go

DeWitt L. Miller

WHAT is more needed at this moment in the history of the church and the world than a fresh outpouring of the divine Spirit? Jesus promised the disciples, "You will receive power when the Holy Spirit has come upon you." You and I need that power today. The Church needs it and the world needs it. Recently I was struck by the analogy between what happened on the day of Pentecost and our modern automobiles with their power brakes and their two hundred and more horsepower motors. These modern cars have power to stop and power to go.

We did not need power brakes in the horse and buggy days. Occasionally old dobbin would become frightened or fractious and would run off and upset the buggy, but very few people got killed. Today the man behind the wheel of our high powered automobiles has become the Number One murderer of all time—more than heart disease, more than cancer, more than war! We need power to stop as well as power to go.

In our church life we have too many horse-drawn organizations equipped with power brakes that are set against going anywhere. There are churches and church schools that are doing things in the same old way in which they have been done for fifty and seventy-five years. Dr. N. L. Englehart of New York City said, "In most communities our schools lag fifty years behind the progress of industry and commerce!" When I heard that I thought to myself, "If the schools are fifty years behind industry and commerce, how far behind are the churches and church schools?" Why is it that businessmen who want the finest and best methods used in their offices, their factories and their businesses, do not tear their hair and raise the roof until the methods and program of their church are as efficient and as effective, as modern and up-to-the minute from office procedures on the one hand to evangelism

Those who are sick in body, mind, morals or spirit because of the way they have been living should heed the call to repentance in Peter's sermon on Pentecost on the other, from raising money to teaching children. There is nothing that pains a true man of God so much as to hear someone say, "We can't do that because we have never done it that way before." That is using power brakes in a horse and buggy set-up!

This does not mean that the modern church does not need power brakes. Peter's sermon on the day of Pentecost was first of all a call to repentance; it was a ringing call for men to come to a screeching halt and turn around and go in the opposite direction. Every week we see people sick in body, mind, morals or spirit, who have gotten that way because of the way they have been living. They want to be well and strong; they want to be free from worry and fear; they want peace and contentment; they want to escape the nagging of a troubled conscience; they want to feel that they are saved. But they still want to do more things than there is time and strength with which to do them; they still want to live beyond their means and try to keep up with their equally foolish neighbors; they want to make things too easy for their children; they want to do as they please and live in violation of the moral code; they want to neglect all the spiritual disciplines. Then when they get all mixed up and confused and the results of their way of living begin to be made manifest in their lives, they become bitter if the preacher cannot say a prayer and call down the power of God to set things straight, so they can go on in the same old selfish, godless way.

I suppose every preacher at some time or another has been called upon to conduct the funeral of a person who lived as though God did not exist and other people did not matter. Then some friend or relative will tell him to take it easy for after all the deceased was good at heart, he meant well and he was not entirely to blame. I am always happy at a time like that for the advice of an older minister early in my ministry who reminded me that I was not expected to be the judge as to the eternal destiny of those who die and that at a funeral my chief task is to bring comfort to those who remain.

Actually, Christian faith and hope as portrayed in the Scriptures offer very little in the way of comfort regarding the eternal destiny of those who neglect their relationship with God and deliberately violate the law of love in their relationship to their fellow men. Bishop Cushman had it right when he wrote into the poem which many of you like very much, "the peace of God is for those who obey." I tell you the time has come for another Pentecost —a time when we come to a halt regarding the way we are living—a time when we apply power brakes.

In Heb. 12:4 the writer reminds his readers, "In your struggle against evil you have not resisted to the point of shedding your blood." There are a lot of things in our society that are wrong: drunkeness, gambling and sex indulgence; taking advantage of people for personal gain and pleasure; emphasis upon improving and multiplying our means and methods of mass destruction, and little emphasis on total disarmament; much preparation for war and little effort to preserve peace. The balance of power is too much in the hands of war makers and too little in the hands of the peacemakers.

Individual Christians and the church do not seem to possess the power brakes or are not using the power brakes necessary to bring these things to a stop, even when every last one of us knows there is danger ahead. We need to know, as the early disciples learned, that the power of God is available for those who are willing to stand up and be counted. We need to cultivate the faith that the gates of hell cannot stand up against the power of the church and of Christian people. We definitely need a new Pentecost —a time when the Holy Spirit will come with power upon us.

Most of all we need power to

WHY I BELIEVE IN GOD

Heinz Regenbogen

SOMEHOW I REALIZE there is a living force,
A power which is working in everything
And every being that exists or grows.
A living power which creates, dissolves and recreates,
While we ourselves are subject to constant change.
Where there is death, there will be continuing life,
Where there is darkness, there will be shining light,
Where there is untruth, there will be lasting truth.
Though I cannot prove the Almighty with a mathematical equation,
I have the overwhelming certainty,
God made this wonderful creation.
When I consider the universe with its mysterious wonders,
Look up into the sky, or in a starry night
Watch a deer hesitantly coming out of its hiding place,
Listen to the sounds of lovely voices,
While resting in the shadows of a tree,
Admire a sunset on the ocean,
Stand on a hill, gazing into a valley where beauty is revealed,
See the change of winter, spring, summer, and fall,
I feel God must be love and the creative power of this all.

go—to go forward in our personal lives and to go forward in the life of the church. It is not enough to be a member of the church; we must be in there giving our witness to the right, adding our influence, giving time and effort that others might be won for the kingdom and that the truths Jesus taught might be practiced in every area of human endeavor. The prophet Joel speaking for the Lord said, "I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh and your sons and daughters will prophesy and your young men shall see visions and your old men shall dream dreams."

We rather expect our young people to get new ideas and to want to do new and different things, but when we possess the Holy Spirit, when we possess the power to go, when we as Christians and as a church are "souped up" so to speak, and geared for going forward, then even older people are going to be facing the future and dreaming of greater things yet to be done, knowing that for the Christian the best of life is always in the future.

Husbands and wives will be creating a deeper and more abiding love for one another—a love that grows and makes their relationship more thrilling and exciting as the years come and go; parents and children will be learning how to express their love and faith in each other—learning how to grow and have fun as a family. The church will be learning how to win people, men and women into a thrilling happy life, a changing relationship to Jesus Christ; finding out how to get everyone to want to do right, to want to bring the finest and best of heart and hand and lay it at the Master's feet, to desire to commit themselves and all they have to seeking first the kingdom of God everywhere and all the time, never growing weary in well doing, believing that in due season the harvest comes if we do not give up, and pressing steadfastly toward the day when men shall be united in their love for God and for one another.

Eva Luoma

It is not enough to be a member of a church; each must also give his witness to the right, and time to win others for the kingdom

Dr. Theodore Ferris points out that wherever there is a disturbance you will find a crowd gathering. The only disturbances in the church in recent years have been man-made disturbances. We have not allowed the Holy Spirit to create in our midst a divine disturbance. The church and Christians are not doing enough to earn the reputation which the early Christians had of turning the world upside down—of being on fire for God. God's spirit cannot operate in the lives of institutions and people who are in a rut. It cannot operate in the lives of people who rest their hope of the future upon the achievement of prophets who are long since dead and buried. It cannot operate in the lives of the proud and self-satisfied; that is why Jesus said that crooks and prostitutes would go into the kingdom of heaven before the religious people. Neither can the Holy Spirit operate in the lives of selfish and undisciplined people.

Sometimes those who travel by air find their plane kept aloft for hours, unable to land because of fog. What kind of fog are we in that keeps the Holy Spirit from making a landing here in our midst, in each one of our lives? If the early disciples could turn the world upside down, so can we! But we need the power to stop the evil and the power to go forward in winning the world for Christ. "If you being evil know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more will your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him." All we need to do is to want it, for if we ask it shall be given. What are we waiting for? Why do we not ask for it believing that we shall receive it and then go out and use it in glorious and wonderful ways?

"Take No Thought"

Luther A. Weigle

TAKE no thought for the morrow" means "Do not be anxious about tomorrow" (Matt. 6:34). "Take no thought how or what ye shall speak" means "Do not be anxious how you are to speak or what you are to say" (Matt. 10:19). "Be careful for nothing" means "Have no anxiety about anything" (Phil. 4:6). "I would have you without carefulness" means "I want you to be free from all anxieties" (1 Cor. 7:32). When Jesus gently reproved Martha for being "careful about many things," it was for being "anxious" (Luke 10:40). In all these cases we are dealing with the Greek word for anxiety; the English words thought, carefulness, and careful were sound enough translations of it in the sixteenth century, but today they mislead the ordinary English reader.

This use of "take thought" occurs once in the Old Testament (1 Sam. 9:5), where the young Saul, failing to find his father's asses, saying to his servant, "Come, let us go back, lest my father cease to care about the asses and become anxious about (take thought for) us." As an illustration of this now obsolete use of the word thought in the sense of anxiety or trouble the Oxford English Dictionary cites a sentence from Samuel Purchas' Pilgrimage (1613), which informs the reader that "Soto died of thought in Florida."

The word secure in 1611 meant without care or anxiety. It described a state of mind which might be overconfident. That meaning of the word is now archaic; when we now use the word secure, we mean really safe. In Judges 8:11 the army was not "secure," but "off its guard"; in Judges 18:7, 10, 27 the people were "unsuspecting." "Devise not evil against thy neighbour, seeing he dwelleth securely by thee" (Prov. 3:29) means:

"Do not plan evil against your neighbour who dwells trustingly beside you."

all around—perfectly developed in the way its Creator had intended. And so must we humans appear to you, Father, for "man looks on the outward appearance, but the Lord looks on the heart" (1 Sam. 16:7).

There came one tense moment when I was aware of a crescendo in the backyard discussion between two of the local cherubs. My own was brandishing a stick menacingly in the direction of the other boy. I restrained myself from calling to him and flashed an unspoken prayer in his direction, "Father, send a shaft of your love down through me and out to my boy, so that he may know he is loved. Dear God, let me be a clear channel!" Instantly he began to smile and laid the stick down. Thank you, Father, for leading me to trust your power rather than my own which has so often brought adverse results.

His daddy is gone this week, acting as dean of a summer camp, helping many youngsters to know you and themselves better. Several times came the question, "Will daddy come home soon? When will he be staying with us again?" And I prayed, "Dear Lord, may my boy someday be as eager to welcome you, his spiritual Father, to live with him of his own free choice, and may you be as real and necessary to him as his earthly father is now."

For just a moment this evening I almost broke contact with you, Father. I had rung the bedtime bell three times and still no son appeared. My patience became impatient as I proceeded to the roundup. I could have informed him with a little less emphasis that he would be staying indoors tomorrow after supper.

As I bathed his little body, this temple in which you and he dwell together, I prayed, "Father, cleanse also his little mind and heart. Let him not go to sleep with a sense of guilt because of misdemeanors. Help his mother to demonstrate your forgiving spirit and your love that is not withdrawn in disapproval at an offense but remains constant toward your erring children."

Last evening as I reflected on each activity of the day, I asked, "Father, can I honestly say that your Holy Spirit directed me to do that, or to say that?" And I was aghast at the number of things I had done and said whose inspiration must have come from a source somewhat lower than divine. And with a new humility I prayed that you would so fill my unconscious mind which is the controlling nine tenths of it, that what slips out without thinking may also be an expression of your will.

As if in answer to that plea, this day has seemed one long continuous prayer. It has been a thrilling day, not because of any unusual happenings but because you have lived in every moment of it with me. I wonder what you will reveal to me tomorrow behind those kitchen curtains.

Robert Morrison, first Protestant missionary in China, is shown translating the Bible into Chinese with the help of two assistants

Robert Morrison

Elgin S. Moyer

TO THE London Missionary Society falls the honor of sending out the missionary who was to begin a century and a half of Protestant missionary work among the Chinese people. The man who ventured to offer himself to the society for the difficult task of entering the closed doors of the great land of China was Robert Morrison, a Scotchman born in Northumbria, England in 1782.

His parents were earnest and consistent Christians who carefully trained their son in Scriptural knowledge and religious duty. As an adolescent he had a decided inclination for study and managed to do a large amount of reading, in spite of the long hours spent in his father's workshop.

At twenty-one he went to London to study for the ministry. The next year he offered himself to the London Missionary Society to go to Timbuctoo, Africa, but was appointed to go to China as the first Protestant missionary to that land. In further preparation for his work he gave special attention to the study of medicine, astronomy and the Chinese language. In order to obtain the language he received aid from a Chinese scholar whom he located living in London, even sharing lodging with him, and by studying and copying some Chinese manuscripts in the British Museum. He was ordained in 1807, and sailed for China later the same year. However, because of the hostility of the East India Company toward Christian missions he found it necessary to come to the United States and to take passage from New York to Canton. Here, receiving a letter of introduction from James Madison, then Secretary of State, he turned his face toward his new home in the Orient.

Upon reaching China, he found himself greatly restricted. He had great difficulty in finding either a place to live or a Chinese to teach him the language. He had to do much of his study in secret, for his teachers carried the penalty of death upon their heads should they be apprehended teaching a foreigner. But Morrison applied himself so diligently that within eighteen months he had mastered the language sufficiently to be employed by the East India Company as an interpreter at a salary of two thousand five hundred dollars, a position which he held for twenty-five years. This gave him a regular income and an assurance of remaining in China. On the very day that he was employed by the East India Company, in February, 1809, he married Miss Mary Morton, an English lady whom he had met when on a trip to Macao and whom he had led to Christ.

In spite of the arduous duties entailed by his position with his employer, Morrison found time to do an amazing amount of work on behalf of the enterprise which had first called him to China. Yet because of the imperial edicts against Christianity, the strained relations between the Chinese and Westerners, the opposition of the Roman Catholics and the unfriendly attitude of the British officials and the East India Company, Morrison from the first had been compelled to restrict himself very largely to the preparation of missionary literature. It was impossible for him to do any public preaching; and it was very difficult to do any personal work. His missionary work was thus confined largely to his writing; and to this he devoted himself assiduously.

In 1812 he completed a grammar which was sent to India to be printed. Then he redoubled his efforts on an Anglo-Chinese dictionary which he had started sixteen years before. The dictionary was published in 1823, in six volumes, each volume as large as a family Bible. The dictionary had 4,595 pages and was almost as much an encyclopedia as it was a dictionary. The company which had refused him passage to China now paid sixty thousand dollars, the cost of publishing these valuable volumes. This dictionary was his most laborious literary achievement and was a work of remarkable industry and scholarship. For the production of this literary masterpiece he is said to have procured and consulted ten thousand Chinese volumes, which he was compelled to do at great financial cost. If he did not call his work herculean, it was because, as Gladstone said, "Hercules never undertook such a task."

In 1813 Morrison had finished his translation of the New Testament. Then he prepared a pamphlet in which he traced the history of the Old Testament. He prepared also a selection of hymns to be used in public and private worship and translated morning and evening prayers from the Book of Common Prayer. He prepared and distributed tracts on the Christian faith. All this time he was working on his translation of the Old Testament. In 1819, with the assistance of William Milne, his first and only recruit and colleague, who had joined him in 1813, he completed the translation of the whole Bible into the Chinese.

Morrison did no small amount of work in bringing relief and health to many of the poor and sick. After purchasing many Chinese medical books and consulting Chinese doctors, he opened a dispensary and helped many who would venture to come to him for aid. In 1818 he founded an Anglo-Chinese school at Malacca in Malay, the center to which Milne had been forced to flee to carry on his missionary work. Until its removal to Hong Kong in 1845, this school did a valuable work though never rising above the grammar grade.

In 1824 Morrison paid a visit to England. While there he was made a fellow of the Royal Society. He spent this, his only furlough to England, seeking to stir up interest in missions to China. In vain he urged the establishing of chairs of Chinese at Cambridge and Oxford. During his residence in England, he was married to Miss Emily Armstrong of Liverpool, his first wife having died in China several years before.

In 1826, back in China, he was caught in the growing friction between the Chinese and foreigners, which eventually culminated in the first Anglo-Chinese War. As interpreter for the East India Company, he was forced to become negotiator between the conflicting interests. His duties were arduous. His strong, wiry constitution was beginning to weaken. When asked whether he was not tired, his reply was: "Yes, I am tired in the work, but not of it. I delight in the work."

Almost from the beginning of his life in Canton, each Sunday he had services in his room, behind closed and locked doors for the few English, American and Chinese people who would come, ten at any one meeting

The Family Counselor

The Family Counselor welcomes letters of inquiry. They may be addressed: Family Life Department, General Brotherhood Board, 22 S. State St., Elgin, Ill.

Dear Counselor,

Television is now at our house. How many hours a day should children be allowed to watch?

A Distressed Mother.

Dear Distressed Mother,

Television is here to stay. We must learn to live with it and to use it to advantage. As an educational medium television exemplifies the ancient proverb, "A picture is worth a thousand words." It is now known that children have developed keen interests and absorbed huge volumes of information about the weather, science, literature and current events through television. Used wisely television may be one of the most valuable educational techniques.

Television has its glaring weaknesses. Currently much of its program fare is anything but educational. Its lurid science fiction, its trashy tragedies, and corny comedies, its so-called quiz game and big money giveaways are a far cry from education. Television seems to be moving toward solid drama, but as yet has made almost no approach to classical music. TV is time consuming and disastrous to conversation.

Parents should assist children in making proper decisions as to program type and amounts of time consumed by television. It may be helpful for parents occasionally to sit with their children and watch what they watch. This mutual viewing helps build rapport and encourages children to believe that parents are not always "against" television.

The TV-meal problem may not be easily sidestepped. Regular meals with the family at the table without interruption of radio or TV are encouraged. Some families are permitting the children to select one TV tray meal per week as a modest compromise of a pressing problem.

It is impossible to fix arbitrary rules controlling the hourly viewing schedule each week. Much depends upon the age of the child. If the children are older, TV viewing ought to depend upon the work they have to do, the completion of their studies, the play time and the quality of the program.

Parents do well to recognize the vast potential for education contained in the troublesome TV set. Only wise parental counsel will insure the best possible use of this modern miracle.

The result of his labors in China as to number of conversions was meager indeed. His first convert, Tsae A-ko, was baptized in 1814 after seven years of effort in China. Perhaps not more than two or three others can be numbered as his converts as a reward for his twenty-seven years of earnest and faithful labor in Canton. However, his missionary life was far from being fruitless. The foundation laying he did for his successors and for the building of the church in China was invaluable. He laid a cornerstone without which further successful missionary work would have been well-nigh impossible.

Dr. Latourette writes; "It is not strange that a life lived so earnestly and with such unremitting toil in an enervating climate amid many strains should end early. Death came in 1834, in Morrison's early fifties, to a body which had long been showing the effects of the adverse conditions, but which the resolute will of its master had kept going until almost the very last." "His name will always have an honored place beside the names of Martyn, Judson, Carey, Williams and others in the heroic age of modern missions."

THANKFUL HEART

Florence M. Bollinger

Bless the Lord, O my soul,
And all that is within me, bless his holy name.

I thrill to the sound of a magpie robin, as perched on the housetop he warbles his most lyric song.

I listen to the ringing of the church bell calling us for an early morning service in dedication of tree-planting around the church.

Bless the Lord, O my soul. May I ever have listening ears in this rich world of sound! Not only for what I audibly hear, but sensitive to the inner heartbeat of another's need, whether it be for bread or shared joy or sorrow.

As a congregation we wend our way to the church. We read of God's creation of all sorts of herbs, trees, fruits for the good of mankind. We sing of God's Word being like a seed to be planted and a harvest expected.

A dozen or more small trees in so many boys' hands blend in a pattern of green and light at the front of the church. As they stand before the congregation the minister offers a moving prayer of dedication over the young trees and the young men who shall plant them.

Our own hearts respond and echo the prayer that these youth may be blessed in their planting of trees to give beauty and restful shade around our church, that through them spiritual blessings too may be planted in the lives and communities they touch.

Thank you, God, for the vigor and idealism of youth: thank you for the life within the seed, for upward reach of soul and plant.

Praise be to God, for his good gifts of sun and rain and the joy of harvest. For the satisfaction of work to do and the promise, "As thy days so shall thy strength be."

. . . Not idle hands or empty leisure, but hands upon the plow guiding the plodding oxen as they turn under furrow upon furrow of hemp to enrich the soil for jowar planting and later reaping grain for bread;

. . . Mothers' hands kneading and shaping bread, stirring pungent curried stew to give a hearty meal to children before they start to school;

. . . Teachers' hands and heads busy as they plan the day for a roomful of children—ideas, ideals and growth to be striven for;

. . . Our hands in thine, O Lord, that by deed and word we help to create a more beautiful and better world.

For every good gift coming from the Father of lights, the father constant in his will to bless, changeless in his love, bless the Lord; O my soul, bless his holy name.

Why I Am a Christian

William E. Thompson

I AM a Christian because the Christian religion embraces the highest ideals known to mankind and offers a creative, constructive and positive approach to God. I am a Christian because of my direct access to God. I may find him without the aid of prescribed rituals or what others may say or do if I am sincere and have a contrite heart. I am a Christian because Jesus has interceded for me. While others may help to strengthen my faith, yet the attributes of God which must be woven into my character are divine gifts channeled through the love of God and given me by Jesus Christ, who is helping me and every Christian to know God better.

There is something within me that gives me a desire to be connected with a power greater and stronger than man, with love that is unlimited in its resources to give me divine help and I find this longing is satisfied in being a Christian. Since I have the divine gift of reason and have been given a conscience and the power to make decisions I find direct access to sources of help greater than man and I exalt Jesus Christ when I claim this right as a Christian. I am a Christian because I believe honest, persistent efforts on my part to find the truth that makes men free will not be denied me as a child of God.

Since I am a Christian and desire to promote the Christian religion I unite with others of similar faith in a fellowship or church. I believe that a group united in their efforts can better promote their cause and reach their definite major purpose of establishing the divine attributes of God in the hearts of men.

MY PRAYER

Martha's house was shining clean;
Her meals perfection, her person neat.
An undone task was never seen
But Mary sat at Jesus' feet.

Lord, help me do my daily task
And give me strength my trials to meet—
But most of all, dear Lord, I ask
Let me sit, like Mary, at thy feet.

THE GREAT ADVENTURE

Calvert N. Ellis

The work of the college in all its activities from classroom to athletic field, from common worship to community service must show a commitment to the Christian faith and life which produces consecrated, dependable mature men and women

THE church-related liberal arts college is the heir to a noble tradition but we are not too certain of our place in the second half of the twentieth century. We know that the public institutions, by which we mean those supported by tax funds, will receive an ever-increasing number of students in the years ahead. We know that their professors receive salaries of at least a thousand dollars a year more than the professors in church-supported colleges. We also know that fewer young people of intellectual ability are willing to make this sacrifice.

In the immediate future the church college must stake out for itself a defined and significant place. This location on the educational map must be plainly marked and sufficiently confined that the constituency of the college knows the institution can do what it proclaims and the educational fraternity recognizes the college as superior in its product. The church college is not a technical school and should resist all efforts to make it conform. Technical education should increase and will with the industrialization of our society. This, however, is the responsibility of the community and the state. Technical institutes will increase in number and kind, but the teaching of these manual and mechanical skills is not the function of a college of arts and science. The college cannot even be a Bible school, training technicians in the Holy Scriptures. Every college offers some courses which are vocational in purpose but we must always remember that these courses are not the important or distinctive feature of the college. The survival of the institution will not depend upon the vocational courses but rather upon how well it fulfills the distinctive function of a college.

On the other hand, our colleges should not try to be universities. The financial resources at our disposal are simply inadequate to attempt graduate work of a superior kind. Most graduate work should be left to the great public universities or the old endowed historic institutions which have facilities and faculties which permit research.

The four-year college of arts and sciences is a unique American institution, found nowhere outside this continent except where American Christian missions have gone. In 1636 Harvard College came into being and following her hundreds of other colleges were born—from the love of God, the desire to serve him and to perpetuate learning. In the Harvard charter of 1650 appears the phrase "the advancement of all good literature, arts and sciences." Thus early in her history Harvard proposed to be both liberal and Christian. I submit to you that these are the distinctive purposes of the American college.

The word liberal has had many unfortunate associations in our time. It has been used to describe all forms of revolt from established patterns of thought and conduct. The radical has too often been confused with the liberal. However, etymologically liberal is still a good word and the best descriptive adjective I know for one of the two distinctive features of the American college. The liberal arts are a major part of our curriculum because "speaking, counting, reasoning, listening, seeing, feeling are necessary to the life of civilized man." They free us from ignorance, superstition and unreasoning prejudice; they open our eyes to an appreciation of beauty and the love of learning.

Veritas liberat—the truth sets free—is the motto of the college which I serve. It is the responsibility of our institutions of higher learning to free the minds of men and women from ignorance and unreasoned prejudice. In setting men free the college will develop in them new tastes and deeper delights.

William James was serious when he advised the women of Radcliffe College that the business of a liberal education is "to help you know a good man when you see him." The most important single thing that the college can do is to expose the student, as Professor James says, to human excellence, in every type of important achievement. More recently Professor Whitehead has observed that a great college should set before its students a "vision of greatness."

The key to the college of liberal arts is the teacher. Good teaching has been a distinctive feature of great colleges. Teachers must cultivate the student taste and hold before the undergraduate standards of excellence in all fields of endeavor. It is true that the alumni have forgotten many of the courses they took but they remember the men who taught them.

True learning is committed to the proposition that through searching into the lives and experience of the race, and particularly into the insights of our great thinkers and prophets, we can find ideas and meanings upon which to draw for our own insights and growth. We will never move beyond our complacency with mediocrity until we instill in our students a love for something better. This is the liberating purpose of the American college.

Our subject is the church-related liberal arts college. This is a particular type of four-year college represented by more than three hundred in the United States. The founders of Harvard College proposed not only to "advance learning" but also to leave a literate ministry to the churches. The college was founded in Christi Gloriam and later dedicated Christo et Ecclesiae. But Harvard has moved far from her founders and the Harvard Report of 1943 on General Education was clearly humanistic. The professors who framed the report favored "a unifying purpose and idea" for the university but did not find one. Quoting from the report: "The conviction that Christianity gives meaning and ultimate unity to all parts of the curriculum, indeed to the whole life of the college . . . is out of the question in publicly supported colleges and is practically, if not legally, impossible in most others . . . Religion is not now for most colleges a practicable source of intellectual unity."

What has brought great minds of our oldest university to make such an assertion? Is it not an indifference which is really an unwillingness to admit value to the scene of intellectual inquiry? The university professor claims to be objective and refuses to examine his own naturalistic presuppositions. He has pushed "objectivity" so far that he has crowded out concerns that are vital to an adequate understanding of man's deepest and most important problems.

The Christian college is built on certain assumptions and asks certain commitments. In the words of President Lowry of

Bahnsen from Monkmeyer

It is the responsibility of the institutions of higher learning to free the minds of men and women from ignorance and prejudice

Wooster College, "The Christian college will be a community existing around a group of learners, both teachers and students, who confess Jesus Christ as their Savior and Lord. They are engaged in a serious search for the knowledge of God and his universe and his demands upon human life."

Why have so many colleges given up these commitments upon which they were founded—even some who still receive financial support from Protestant denominations? Is it as President Hutchins of the University of Chicago says, "The higher learning in America has developed a broad urbanity, an all-engulfing tolerance, which finds it easy to be hospitable to everything except conviction—and genuine conviction, which must not be confused with tolerance, is one of the crying needs of our age"? Perhaps we as educators should listen to the late Peter Marshall as he prayed for the Senate of the United States: "Give us the courage to stand for something, lest we fall for everything."

Has our desire for objectivity, for scientific impartiality, made us invent a new superstition in place of God's revealed truth? Professor Rabi of Columbia University says, "Mankind seems to have a genius for the invention of superstition." We must free our students, happy innocent pagans, many of them, from the worship of the twentieth century American god, science. In our church colleges young men and women should find the integration necessary for quiet living and the strength in Jesus Christ sufficient to overcome the disillusion of the day and the fears which plague our skyscraper, luxury-loving, bomb-fearing civilization.

What makes a college Christian? Is it the required Bible courses, the compulsory chapel and the social regulations? Is it the way in which the trustees are elected or clauses in the charter? I am afraid that too often these have been accepted as the criteria. As in so many others areas of life we are likely to mistake the outside appearance for the vital reality. Too often a college has claimed to be Christian which has shown slight concern for the honesty of its claim to being a college. No orthodox creed, evangelistic fervor or required Bible courses can be substituted for intellectual honesty.

A small Christian college should not try to gloss over its natural handicaps. It may be far removed from the cultural variety of a large university and none of its professors may be world-renowned scholars, but it can emphasize the values which are inherent in its character and the contributions which it has made to the lives of its students. The simplicity and flexibility of the small church college are not insignificant blessings. In the friendly cooperative atmosphere found on our campuses, where the personality development of the student is of paramount importance, real education can take place. We have seen evidences of it.

President Herbert Hoover in his memoirs says that during his college days at Leland Stanford he "soaked up" a great deal of education. This can be true in any small college—and reveals why the most important fact about a Christian college is the personal commitment of those associated with the institution, from trustees to janitors. The work of the college in all its activities from classroom to athletic field, from common worship to community service must show a commitment to the Christian faith and life which produces consecrated, dependable mature men and women.

How easy it is to state these ideals but how difficult to attain them! I have found it easier in twelve years as a college president to build a college of liberal arts than to build a fellowship of committed Christian men and women. At times it seems impossible—and to many it always will be—but not to us in moments of vision and high resolve. This is one of those moments. The Church of the Brethren is awakening to its responsibility to its colleges. The church realizes the source of its leadership and knows that the college—and only the college—can guarantee its future as a denomination.

The members of the church appreciate the plus which the student receives in the church college. We who labor each day may see the results immediately, but the total effect is apparent years later—and we will receive the financial resources necessary for our survival. I do not anticipate that we will be able to secure large resources from industry—our colleges are too young and we have not prepared for business leadership in a capitalistic society—but I do believe that we will find a multitude of persons who will be anxious to join in the support and development of the church college.

Briefs from General Brotherhood Board Sessions

Church Theme. The General Brotherhood Board will be bringing to the 1956 Annual Conference the recommendation that the present church theme, Seek First His Kingdom, be extended for another year from Oct. 1, 1956, to Oct. 1, 1957. The Committee on the 250th Anniversary will be bringing to the Board a recommendation on a theme beginning Oct. 1, 1957, and extending through the anniversary year.

Long-Range Planning. The Board through its Goals and Program Committee is entering into long-range planning looking forward to launching a program of advance in 1958. This long-range planning does not overlook the present program of advance in areas such as stewardship and evangelism.

Stewardship Education. The Board gave attention to its role in the implementation of the Conference action on stewardship. It recognized and approved regional workshops for the training of additional leaders in the areas of stewardship and local church finance, authorized the officers to invite each district to give special attention to stewardship education and the every-member canvass method of enlisting all members as givers in each local church, and urged the laity through men's and women's work to co-operate in a strategy to translate Conference action in the life of our Brotherhood.

Immigration Hearings. The Board approved a recommendation from the Brethren Service Commission that the Board give testimony on current immigration hearings.

BVS. The Brethren Service Commission presented a plan for enlarging our Brethren Volunteer Service program to take in young people from other denominations. Under this plan the young people will be chosen by their respective denominations, participate in our regular BVS training program at New Windsor and then be assigned to projects within their own church programs.

Ecuador Mission. The Board authorized the enlargement of the mission staff in Ecuador to ten. A work camp was also approved for the summer of 1956. This work camp will be open to ten or twelve young people of college level and will be promoted along with other Brethren international work camps. A Brethren tour to Ecuador between November 1956 and May 1957 was planned. Many of the considerations of the Ecuador mission grew out of the recommendations of the deputation (Paul M. Robinson and Leland S. Brubaker) recently returned from that field.

Material Aid. The Board approved a sewing kit project for Nigeria. Projects for seed and school packets were approved in an earlier meeting.

Personnel. The resignation of Vernard Eller as youth editor effective Sept. 1, 1956, was received with regret and appreciation for his services. Bro. Eller is planning to enter graduate school in preparation for college teaching.

La Verne College

Six La Verne College seniors have been named in Who's Who Among Students in American Colleges and Universities this year. They are: Jack Brennecke, Long Beach; Ken Calkins, Azusa; Edith Cosner, Waterford; Dick Coffman, La Verne; Gorman Miller, New Paris Ind.; and Esther Williams, Wenatchee, Wash.

Two carloads of La Verne students representad La Verne College at the Bridgewater College BSCM conference at Thanksgiving. Prof. Daniel M. Long, director of Christian life activities, and Prof. J. Jack Melhorn, on sabbatical leave from the sociology department, accompanied the students. Mr. Melhorn was a leader at the conference.

New Era banquet date for 1956 has been changed from March 16 to March 9 to avoid conflict with an important education conference to be held in the area on the week end of March 16.

Trustees of the college, in their fall meeting on Oct. 29, approved the $200,000 government loan agreement for new dormitory construction to accommodate fifty-three women students. New trustees present were Howard Nordstrom of Fresno, succeeding Albert Davis of McFarland, whose term had expired, and Loyal Heiny of Empire, completing the unexpired term of Zafon Hartman, who had moved from the church district.

Anniversary dinner date has been set for Jan. 17 commemorating the sixty-fourth academic year of the college. The dinner will honor all who make contributions of $64 per couple or more and will serve as a kick-off to the Pomona Valley phase of the major development program now under way. Carl Miller, executive director of the Pacific Coast edition of the Wall Street Journal, will be the speaker.

Another recreation laboratory, the third sponsored by the college in co-operation with General Brotherhood offices, will be held at Fresno on Dec. 27-31. It is planned especially for local church and youth leaders in the region and those interested should contact Dwight Hanawalt at La Verne College.

A CALL TO CHRISTIAN SERVICE

Barbara Gettel

I FELT the call of dedicating a year of my life to Christian service because of what Christ has meant to me and done for me. My desire was to do home mission work and it was fulfilled when I entered the Brethren Volunteer Service program.

When I arrived at the Flat Creek mission project I was deeply impressed with the work that was being done for the church and the community. I was given a warm welcome by the people of Clay County and by the directors of the mission, the Allen Weldys, who have served here for the past four years.

Allen Weldy greets two BVS'ers as they arrive on the mission horse from a visit to one of the homes near the mission

There are many challenges in this type of work and our hearts must go into it. Because of the scarcity of tillable soil and work opportunities in this area, we try to give assistance in improving living conditions as well as spiritual guidance. I am impressed when I see many people walk at least two miles to Sunday school and church. Many of us do not go when we live near the church or even when we have transportation.

The work of a BVS'er at Flat Creek consists of visiting in the homes, planning programs for young people's meetings, leading singing, teaching in Sunday school and vacation Bible school, telling Bible stories in the day schools, classifying relief goods and helping on sale days in distribution, and helping with the cleaning of the church and with other maintenance work such as gardening, housecleaning and painting. Another task is driving the mission truck, occasionally for maintenance work but usually to transport children and adults to and from Sunday school, vacation Bible school and other related programs. Many people live beyond walking distance of the mission center. For transportation, besides walking and driving the mission truck, there is also a mission horse on which the BVS'ers ride.

In addition to the mission center there are four other mission points where Sunday school is held weekly and Saturday night preaching services are held once a month. The BVS'ers walk two miles—one way—to teach Sunday school each Sunday at the Elisha's Creek chapel, we are a little tired when we return but we have a feeling of accomplishment. In the afternoon we conduct two Sunday schools, one at Sugar Creek, four miles from the mission, and one at Double Creek, which is ten miles away. A church service is held in the evening so our Sunday schedule is extremely full.

The Christmas season is a very busy but joyous time for all of us here. Each of the 307 Sunday-school children is given a treat of candy and fruit and an individually wrapped gift. In some cases this is the only gift the child receives. This last year a Christmas program was given at Flat Creek; during the holidays an open house was observed at Flat Creek for the members of the church and each family received a Christmas basket.

Teaching in the vacation Bible school this summer was a rich new experience for me. We conducted five schools; the last one was the most interesting and challenging. The children in this school had never attended Bible school before; however, they were very alert and their interest was commendable.

Recently we started a nursery school which is held for two hours once a week. This is a highlight for the children and a great opportunity for the teachers to show them how to share and play together and to give them some Bible training. We feel that the nursery is a great help to the mothers as well as a service to the community at large.

There is much to tell you about the Flat Creek mission work; these are some of the experiences I have enjoyed throughout my term of service.

I have found joy and satisfaction at Flat Creek; memories of the mission will always remain near my heart. My sincere wish is that every young person could give a year of his life in the Brethren Volunteer Service program. If you hear the call, do not resist it, for it may never come again. "Also I heard the voice of the Lord, saying, 'Whom shall I send, and who will go for us?' Then said I, 'Here am I; send me' " (Isa. 6:8).

REFUGEE RESETTLEMENT NOTES

AT THE New Windsor refugee resettlement office, letters received from the refugees themselves add a great deal of human interest to the daily program. One refugee family who has recently found a new home in the United States after having lived in an Austrian camp writes:

"Greetings! We are made very happy to know that you have an interest in our future. You have already given to us so much help.

"We are glad to be able to tell you that all is going well. We have been happy during these weeks since we have arrived here, and we have very good impressions of this place where we can start our new life in peace. We don't want anything more in the future but just keep the way we are having now.

"We are deeply impressed from the friendliness and helpfulness of the people from the Brethren church. They met and welcomed us with gifts as if we were their brothers and sisters.

"We are not able as yet to write English because we had only six months of English classes in Europe that were arranged by the Brethren Service. This has helped us in our starting. We like church and we always went to church during our hard and bitter years; so we will not miss to attend church now when we feel happy.

"I would like to tell you of many, many good things which have impressed me, however that's impossible because they are too many.

"Your happy neighbors"

". . . as if we were their brothers and sisters." We are their brothers and sisters and therefore should have a concern for them. Soon the doors to the United States, now open to so many refugees, will be closed; the Refugee Relief Act expires in 1956. Are you doing your share? Write the Refugee Resettlement Office, New Windsor, Md.

Austrian Report

The Austrian workers, Don Durnbaugh and John Hershey, attended the Christmas celebration at Thalham tubercular hospital. Dr. Ruchler, director of this refugee hospital, praised the assistance of Brethren Service as "our most faithful friend." Without the material aid of BSC, Thalham would never have become the institution it is today.

In addition to the material given to the hospital in general, Friendship Packets were distributed individually to all the patients so everyone received a personal gift.

The project-of-the-month is Friendship Packets for Christmas distribution. The Friendship Packets are described on pages eight and nine of the Material Aid Handbook which is available by writing to Director of Material Aid, Brethren Service Center, New Windsor, Md.

Celebrating Christian Holidays

Mrs. John D. Myers
Harrisonburg, Virginia

WORKERS need to plan carefully to help make the celebration of Christian holidays in the church truly Christian. Materialistic influences bring so many demands and compete for time, meanwhile distorting appreciations and Christian values. The church has the unique responsibility of keeping its people aware of the sacred origin and purpose of the Christian holidays. The church school reaches out to all age groups and the teaching program can be effective if workers have a clear, unified sense of purpose regarding celebrations for these days. Every group should study and plan. The following suggestions may be adapted for a workers' conference in your church on this topic.

Religous News Service

Children all around the world find new meaning and significance in the Christmas story as they enjoy enacting the nativity scene

Suggestions for Developing the Meeting

(Choose that which fits your needs and resources)

1. To improve fellowship in the group, choose a game suitable for adults or have a short period of singing. Eating together is good for fellowship, but caution should be taken to make refreshments simple. If a meal is desired, it should be potluck style.

2. Have someone who will be objective and unbiased give a brief summary of the ways in which the church has observed special days during the past few years. Ask the person to include special programs, music, projects, gifts and recreational experiences. Include all age groups.

3. Following the summary, break into small buzz groups or evaluate by departments. Before the meeting, this should be carefully planned so that a discussion leader may be appointed for each department or group. The size of the group may determine the choice of plan. The purpose of this discussion will be to evaluate past experiences and to list present needs.

4. Out of the background of evaluation, the group will be ready to plan for this year. Each department superintendent or discussion leader will need to keep the following questions before the group as they plan.

(1) How can the church enrich and help family observances to be more Christian?

(2) What can we do to make observances in the church completely centered on the original meaning and significance of each day?

(3) Should the personal gift idea be carried into special day observances in the church (even for children)?

(4) What materials are available to help us?

(5) Should any age group be used to put on a program if the experience is of questionable value and significance to them?

(6) How can we plan projects which will educate toward year-around Christian stewardship for all age groups?

(7) How can we organize plans so that we order materials well in advance and delegate responsibility? (Last minute planning and hurry are responsible for many failures.)

(8) If we use projected visual materials, how can we be sure of selecting the best and who will decide which age groups should see them? Some Christmas films and most Easter films are unsuitable and may be even harmful for some children.

5. If the planning and discussion has been by departments, it may be well for the groups to come together for a few minutes and share their plans so that thinking may be unified. At this time an over-all committee should be appointed if you do not have one. The function of this committee will be to work with department directors for clearance so that plans unify and do not conflict. In the small church they will all work together in making plans, but a committee will still be needed to follow through.

6. Close with a brief worship service.

A CHURCH PLANS A TRAINING PROGRAM

The Dundalk church, Maryland, has set up the following goals in leadership training:

1. Provide a standard leadership training class for all teachers.

2. Provide up-to-date library for officers, teachers and age groups.

3. Give each new teacher at least one course in the leadership training class before assigning him to teach a class.

4. Provide enough teachers, so that each one can take additional courses in the training class, which is set up during the church school hour.

5. Give each teacher a leave-of-absence from class assignment every three to five years. This would be a period of rest, evaluation of interest and further study and preparation.

6. Give financial support to officers and teachers who attend conferences, workshops, seminars and training schools away from the local church.

7. Provide scholarship fund for attending and/or working in the church camp.

Don't Say, "I'm Not Qualified to Teach"

IN THE fall of the year a great many of our churches are faced with the problem of securing new personnel for the offices in the church and more particularly with the baffling problem of securing teachers to staff our Christian education departments. Time after time, persons who we feel would make good teachers have been asked to give time to this task and they reply, "Oh, I'm not qualified to teach."

Did many of us when faced with the task of learning to cook just say, "Oh, I'm not qualified to cook," and then sit back hoping our husbands would earn enough salary to hire a maid to do the cooking? No, we realized this task was going to be an important part of our lives; so we secured good cookbooks and tried new recipes, we counseled with those who had the reputation of being good cooks and then we busied ourselves in learning the art of cooking.

Did many of us when faced with the problem of learning to sew to provide clothes for our families just sit back and say, "Oh, I'm not qualified to sew"? No, we secured a sewing machine, we counseled with those who had the reputation of being good seamstresses, we enrolled in a class on sewing or we followed closely the suggestions given on the patterns. We set ourselves to the task of learning how to become a good seamstress.

Learn How to Work

Did many of us when faced with with the challenge of earning a living for your family just say, "Oh, I'm not qualified to earn a living"? No, you realized how essential this would be for the happiness of your family; so you went to a special school to learn how to do the work you wanted to do, you counseled with those who were doing the same kind of work or you became an apprentice in some firm. You learned how to do your work well.

How many of us when asked to teach a class in Sunday school have readily replied, "I'm just not qualified to teach," and then sat back hoping someone who was automatically qualified would come along and teach our children. Oh, yes, we say that teaching our children the spiritual truths is important, but "someone else" should give his time to this work—it is not for us.

Cooking is important and we could not get along without good cooks. Providing clothes is important and sewing for our families certainly eases the strain on the budget. Earning a living is important and every able-bodied man takes pride in providing for his family. Who of us would want to say that our "spiritual growth" is any less important?

Learn How to Teach

There are so many opportunities today for teachers to learn how to teach that it hardly behooves any of us to give the flimsy excuse that we are not qualified to teach. Book after book has been written to give helps to teachers who sincerely want to learn. In all the larger cities and in many smaller communities, leadership training courses are offered free of charge. Most of us know good teachers and they are willing to counsel with any who would like to improve their techniques of teaching. All of our good curriculum materials give us not one, but many "patterns" for teaching so that we may learn various methods for presenting the lessons. There are suggestions in the materials for good reading to help us grow as we teach. Reading not only gives us content, but it gives us a feeling of being better prepared to teach. We can learn through reading from others' experiences.

Men as Teachers

Another fact we often fail to recognize is that we are not always using the people who may be potential teachers. Women do not have a priority on teaching in the Sunday school. Many of our young men would make fine teachers if they were asked and given an opportunity to learn the techniques of teaching in the children's department.

Teaching is one of the finest ways to express Christian service. You are molding character in young lives and creating good citizens for the world and for God's kingdom. The next time you are asked to teach a class don't say, "I'm not qualified to teach." Instead say, "I may not be qualified to teach now, but I will learn how to make a contribution in this important work."—Mrs. Milton C. Early, Morrill, Kansas.

September days in Nigeria are warm or hot at noon but cool in mornings and evenings

Seeing Nigeria

With Dorris Blough

Climate

WE THOUGHT we were coming to a hot place, but when we arrived in September at Garkida, just at the end of the rains, we found it quite pleasant. The days were warm or hot at noon but cool in mornings and evenings.

Suddenly one day in November, the rains did not come as they had every day for months. The trees turned yellow, orange and gold and one could imagine themselves in the States in the fall. The leaves fell, covering the ground with a golden carpet. However, soon new leaves came out on some of the trees. Flowers and plants of all kinds turned brown rapidly without water. We had anticipated a view of parched earth and brown vegetation. To our surprise, there were many green things springing up as well as the green leaves which came on some of the trees.

In December and January we got out our flannel nightgowns and all the covers we had. We had listened to the people who told us we were going to a hot country and consequently did not bring enough covers. Water does not freeze in this particular area, but getting out of bed on a cold morning is just as difficult as anywhere.

The Africans do not like December, January and February as well as other months because they are too cold, they think.

Not long after the rains stopped, the Africans began burning off the bush. At night you would see fires in all directions. It was a pretty sight. A few days after an area had been burned, a narrow-bladed grass sprang up and before long the blackened earth was green again, not a lush green as in the rainy season, but not a barren earth as we had imagined.

For a couple of months before the rains start again hot humid weather is expected, although this year March was most pleasant with only two nights so warm that we slept without cover all night. April has been more humid with a couple of insignificant showers. Temperatures range above 100° every day. Sometime in early May the rains will start and will come at almost exactly 4:00 every afternoon. Huge thunderheads will build up in the east, and the torrential downpour lasts perhaps an hour. The next day it does the same. The rest of the day is sunny and pleasant, the nights cool and comfortable.

One of the most incredible things about Northern Nigeria is the way in which the trees, bushes and flowering plants put forth leaves and flowers at the end of the dry season —before the rains have come. After months without a drop of water, they are still able to pretend it is spring and put on their new garments. It coincides pleasantly with Easter as does spring in the States and makes the reawakening of life more meaningful. There is no sharp change in the climate to cause this, but something must tell the plants that rain is just around the corner.

The Garkida station is considered hotter than most of the other stations. Most of the others are 600-1,000 feet higher than Garkida; hence they have cooler weather all the time.

So you see Africa is not the torrid place you may have thought. In fact, if you decide to spend your vacation in Northern Nigeria instead of Florida or California, you will find that most of the time the weather is quite delightful.

Thoughts on a Monday Night

Virginia B. Schechter
Anklesvar, India

THE women of the mission compound have just held their weekly prayer meeting in our home. We all sat on the floor together—sang a song, read Scripture and prayed. Their prayer meetings are truly prayer meetings. Taking turns around the circle each woman tells of her special request for prayer—maybe it is for her sick child or for the Christian teachers, that they might be Christian witnesses in the government schools. Tonight since Joe, my doctor husband, was suddenly called away to the Bulsar hospital, the women offered special prayers for his safety, that he would be given strength and wisdom for the operation he was called to perform. Their faith, hope and trust in prayer seems very genuine to me.

Tonight after our meeting, I asked them if they would care for tea. Hearing a few self-conscious giggles but no "nays," I decided they would like tea. As we drank tea together, we talked of our differing customs. What a contrast are our methods of raising children, of housekeeping, of dress but, still, what a happy fellowship we can have together. How much we can offer each other.

As they were saying good night, Naomibai, an outstanding Indian Christian woman and also my language teacher, said, "If you are afraid or need help remember we are all near." Then another lady told of how Miss Shickel kept a whistle handy and when she needed someone she would blow loudly. She even called them to prayer meeting that way. "Well," I said, "I have no whistle but I can yell."

We have been living in a bungalow on the girls' school compound at Anklesvar since June 1. Surrounding our bungalow are homes of teachers in the school and also of other Christian workers. Since our full-time job this year is learning the Gujarati language, we are finding it a great advantage to live close to the people. Every day we have numerous chances to use and practice our Gujarati. Some of the people listen to us talk and probably inwardly shudder at our mistakes but outwardly smile and answer back. Others like to contribute a helpful hint or two and sometimes when we are at a loss to finish a phrase or sentence, they read our minds and say it for us!

Everyday Kenny and Mark, our lively one-and-a-half and three-and-a-half year-olds play with the Indian children. These children love their American toys, especially Mark's tricycle, their trucks and cars. Having no girls in our family we have no dolls. The little girls of the compound just cannot understand why we have none.

Kenny, who has just recently started to speak English, is now budding forth in Gujarati. Both boys say such words as bai (woman), avo (come), apo (give), salaam (Indian greeting) and so on.

Our main job since arriving in India, Oct. 16, 1954, has been to learn Gujarati. This is just the first year of a two-year course. However, our second year will be divided between language and other work. For my husband this means part-time work in the hospital. Learning the language often drives one to distraction. Just why cannot these people say things as simply as we do in English! But more and more we are finding it a rewarding experience. It is a great joy and satisfaction to be able to understand one's Indian co-workers.

Will you remember us all in your thoughts and prayers, just as our Indian Brethren do?

A Lesson in Prayer

Ruth F. Brooks
Vyara, India

ONE evening after a village brother brought his wife to the mission room in the government maternity hospital, he came to our porch and with a smiling face told some of his experiences as a Christian.

He and his wife have been followers of Christ for many years. Their home is in a small village, distant from the railroad, with no medical help near. "My wife is a woman of great faith and prayer," he beamed. "When cholera swept our area some years ago, my father and my wife fell seriously ill. At evening, my father was at death's door. My wife was suffering greatly but she said, 'Our Savior Jesus once raised the dead. He can raise father too, and make me well. Let us pray.' After prayer, the family settled down for the night.

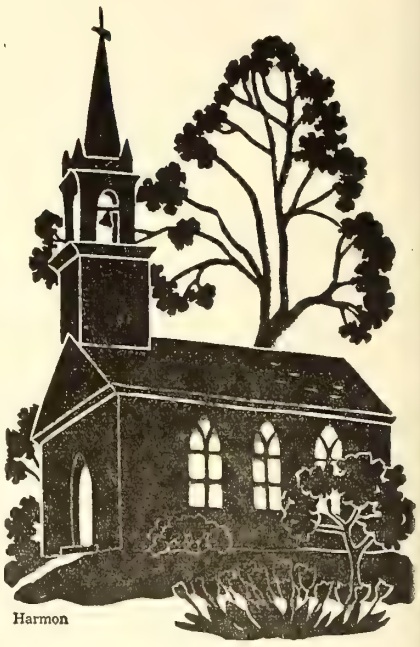
"In the morning the father rolled over, got up and walked about. He is living today. My wife recovered. Oh, we have many blessings for which to praise him! Let us pray just now!" He was on his knees in an instant. I knelt too. Our brother prayed as a friend talking to Friend, eagerly, thankfully. I also prayed.

An Open Door

Bert G. Richardson

AN OPEN door has been set before the North and South Carolina District. The open door is at the Loggins school house, which for years has been the meeting place of the Blue Ridge congregation.

Blue Ridge congregation had its beginning in the Old Loggins school house about the year of 1910. When the present-day building was erected it became the home of the church. The Brethren sent their children to "Loggins" to get an education, and then assembled there on Sunday, perhaps once or twice a month, to hear the gospel. In that day there were many homes in the community and the church was pretty strong. However, trouble soon developed for this church, as it has for so many more of our rural churches. The members of the Blue Ridge congregation began to drift down from the Blue Ridge mountains out into the Piedmont belt, into the textile region and into Maryland and West Virginia in search of employment. Employment was secured. Perhaps they thought of the good cold water and the cool breeze back in the Blue Ridge, but most of them did not go back. At the beginning of 1955 there were only fourteen members on the church register and only two were resident members. It appeared that the days of the Blue Ridge congregation were numbered.



Then things began to happen. First of all, road improvement in this section of Wilkes County, N. C., brought about a consolidation of schools. This not only meant that the people who still lived in the Blue Ridge community would have better educational opportunities, but it also meant that the Loggins school house was needed no longer by the Wilkes County board of education and it, along with several more caught in this new program, was advertised for sale to the highest bidder.

This matter was brought to the attention of the district board of North and South Carolina. After careful consideration of the problem, the board decided that it would be best to try to keep this frontier in the Blue Ridge Mountains. The thought was that even if the possibilities of a thriving church did not appear too favorable, it would be wise to maintain this place of worship for the few families of that community. Not only could it be a place to worship but it could also be a place of community activities. At this time about all the board had in mind was to maintain the one-Sunday-a-month preaching date. Money to make this purchase was needed immediately and there were not sufficient funds in the district budget. The Ministry and Home Mission Commission of the General Brotherhood Board was contacted and a loan of $200 was secured. The building was purchased at auction for $165 and was deeded to the North and South Carolina District.

Prior to the purchase of the building, the one preaching service a month was made possible by Bro. Kermit Farrington, who had always been a good and faithful servant to the Blue Ridge congregation and he was always careful to reserve the second Sunday of each month for Blue Ridge. His devoted service and leadership there were destined to bring forth fruit. Suddenly it came!

Some time in May the area fieldworker, along with Bro. Farrington, visited Blue Ridge. It appeared that there would be sufficient people to start a Sunday school if leadership could be obtained. This was not easy to secure. Workers in other congregations were contacted but wanting to be present to assist in the work of their own local congregations none of them would accept. However, on Sunday, June 26, the fieldworker and his wife, with the assistance of one of the members of the congregation, Mrs. Carl Patrick, and Barbara Cleary of the Riverside congregation, the first Sunday school was conducted with an attendance of twenty and an offering of $2.80.

Since that Sunday the trend has been upward. The average attendance for August was twenty-four and for September it was twenty-seven. The first two Sundays of October the attendance was thirty-four and forty-four respectively. About seventy-five per cent of this attendance is young people and children which indicates that there are possibilities of a thriving church being started here in the future. During early September Brethren Kermit Farrington and David Cleary conducted a revival meeting and the results were five additions to the church. The revival was concluded with the love feast on Saturday evening. However, all the new members were baptized on Saturday so that they could partake of the love feast service. Bro. Farrington, who has been serving Blue Ridge for years, reported the largest attendance and most interest that he has ever witnessed there.

On Sunday, Oct. 9, the annual home-coming services and the church dedication services were conducted by Brethren Kermit B. Farrington, David Cleary and the author. Many brethren from the other churches in the Ashe-Allegheny area were present to indicate that the people of the district are interested in this work. Bro Jack Scruggs, field representative of the Polk area, and some brethren from Melvin Hill and Mill Creek congregations were present. The offering was almost adequate to repay the loan received from the General Brotherhood Board. A program of special music was conducted under the direction of Ivan Gascho, pastor of the Mount Carmel church.

Surely there is an "open door" for the district at Blue Ridge. Blue Ridge has come a long way but it still has a long way to go. We must look forward to repaying the debt completely; we must make some repairs on the building and around it, such as wiring, painting, parking area, sign, etc. We must see that the Sunday school is maintained, that an adequate ministry is provided, that vacation Bible schools are conducted, that the young people get to Camp Carolina. The door at Blue Ridge is open but we must work to keep it open to new and better frontiers in this section of the Blue Ridge Mountains.

SHIFTING SANDS

NOT ALL sand dunes are as barren as these in Death Valley, California. Even here the wind has not yet erased the footprints of some lone desert traveler. Yet it is the wind that marks the sand with a peculiar ribbed pattern, it is the wind that determines the crest of each dune, it is the wind that shifts the contours of the surface so often that no fixed landmarks remain.

Beautiful as the desert dunes may be they offer no inducements for building a permanent residence. It is still true that a wise man builds his house upon a rock foundation, not shifting sand. Only a firm rooting in stable soil can prevent a Christian's being "tossed to and fro and carried about by every wind of doctrine." It is not the shifting hopes and fears of our changing times but rather the foundation truths of our Christian faith that can give us the foothold we need for walking and the rooting we need for growth.

The Gospel Messenger welcomes letters commenting on editorials, articles and news. Letters should be brief and brotherly.

Pastor's Viewpoint

I appreciate Bro. Spangler's letter in the Oct. 22 issue but hope that the viewpoint of a pastor might reveal the other side.

1. Using the best talents is fine as he suggests, but should we ignore those willing and dedicated even though they have little talent? We could help them to grow. Most small churches have to use every one regardless of talent.

2. As a minister, I prefer to sit back and worship as a layman instead of being asked to assist, as Bro. Spangler suggested, when in another congregation. The pastor has his own program. Why should I, a visiting minister spoil it?

3. If I were an elder, I would not want to be presiding elder in the church in which I held my membership if it could be avoided. There are too many problems which a local member, no matter how devoted, just could not help solve because of sides taken. Besides a presiding elder could not vote on any issue. Using elders as assistants would be wonderful if there are no hard feelings or jealousy on the part of the elder for the pastor's job.

4. Concerning his sixth suggestion, if he means a full salary, I agree, but a lot of churches need full-time care. How else can they grow? To work outside is no disgrace to a minister even though a Bethany graduate. Thus he can help the church to grow into a full-time pastorate. Who will accept the challenge? Not all of the opportunities grow upon the "trees in Brooklyn" or in the large city churches.—Edward E. Lyons, Burnettsville, Ind.

Holy Kiss

This is to ask for information and clear thinking regarding the practice of the "holy kiss" among Christians. The "kiss of peace" as practiced in the South India church as described in the Nov. 5 Gospel Messenger might be taken by a hurried reader to be a kiss using the lips, but is clearly an affectionate touch with the hand. Webster's dictionary allows this broader meaning to this word.

As to practice in the Church of the Brethren, I would like to know if there are many members or localities where the practice is to touch the lips to the cheek rather than lips to lips. Where I grew up in Southern Illinois the practice of putting lips to lips was the only practice that I knew or heard of. But I wonder if the kiss on the cheek is not more proper; and to justify this I quote from Smith's Bible dictionary. "Between individuals of the same sex . . . the kiss on the cheek as a mark of respect or an act of salutation has at all times been customary in the East . . . In the Christian church the kiss of charity was practiced . . . It was embodied in the earlier Christian offices."—O. E. Gibson, Westmont, Ill.

Far-reaching Influence

Today as I was reading the Gospel Messenger, I marveled at the fine paper you and your helpers have made out of our church paper. You are making a worth-while contribution to our church. The Messenger has a far-reaching influence on the Brotherhood. It is rendering a very valuable service. You are promoting real, stimulating, progressive ideas without in any way overlooking the power of simplicity.

A church paper has a personality like individuals. Its spirit is quite as important as the news and message that it brings. As a real sermon builds character and transforms life so the Messenger does the same thing on a much larger scale. I am praying that our Father will give you strength and wisdom for your ministry.—H. L. Hartsough, North Manchester, Indiana.

A Better Man

Your editorial, "A Replacement for Davy," in the Nov. 5 Messenger was most interesting to me.

You probably know, but if not, I am sure you will be interested to know that Walt Disney has done up the story of Johnny Appleseed on a 45 rpm record, two sides, in quite nice form and it is one of our children's favorite records. It does the story up quite well and my husband and I both have talked about what a beautiful story of a hero of peacemaking it is.

One evening while our children were listening quite intently to Johnny Appleseed the five and one-half year old boy said, "You know, mommy, I believe Johnny Appleseed was a better man than Davy Crockett." This on his own—but yet, we would hope that he would have some background for it.—Mrs. Joseph Mason, Timberville, Va.

"He has showed you, O man, what is good:
And what does the Lord require of you
but to do justice, and to love kindness,
and to walk humbly with your God?"

The Heart of the Matter

Wayne Zunkel

A GREAT many people have accepted a popular idea which says that to assert a particular belief in God is thereby to be a Christian! The results of this idea are intriguing and many. But the idea is wrong.

To illustrate, take Hitler as an example. During World War II in our effort to maintain toward him a sustained hatred we unlovingly bestowed on him the title of atheist.

I do not want to be in the position of trying to defend Hitler. But the fact of the matter is that Hitler was not an "irreligious" man. Actually he was responsible for the building of over twenty state churches. A Mennonite professor at Bethany tells us that a large number of the Mennonites and many others of the devoutly religious of Germany were his ardent followers. They regarded him as a pious German patriot who neither smoked nor drank, who was giving to their country the type of devoted leadership which no good German could question.

But, you insist, Hitler was an evil man. And we would have to agree. In the light of what we have been permitted to know, Hitler was an evil man. But even so, it is not correct to say that he was irreligious.

Another case in point is that of Stalin. Our slogan makers relegated him to the same position. And we have about accepted their verdict as final. Another "godless atheist."

Actually, as a young man he began seminary training for the priesthood in the Orthodox Church. Robert Sherwood in his book, Roosevelt and Hopkins, points out that in Stalin's meetings with Roosevelt and Churchill it was a common thing for him to invoke God's blessings on their undertakings. Not a good man from what we know. But neither was he irreligious.

One would have thought that the Christmas spirit would have tempered our attitudes here. But it did not seem to have much effect. Last Christmas numerous newscasters urged that we give thanks that we can celebrate Christmas—realizing that in the Communist half of the world people may no longer celebrate Christ's birthday.

Lost in the avalanche of hate was an almost unnoticed news item: Malenkov, successor to Stalin and another supposed atheist, removed the traditional Christmas tree from its spot in the Kremlin and replaced it with a manger scene. How difficult it is for us to see how a man could be religious without at the same time also being good. And because we can not see the distinction the propaganda seems so logical.

Actually, Jesus deals with just this problem very pointedly. In the manner which is characteristically his he goes to the heart of the problem so simply and so directly that there is no mistaking what he means. Said

When Negroes moved into a new housing development in Miami, Florida, the place was bombed, creating the shambles shown in the picture. Jesus said, "Whatever you wish that men should do to you, do so to them." Is this what we would want done to our homes?

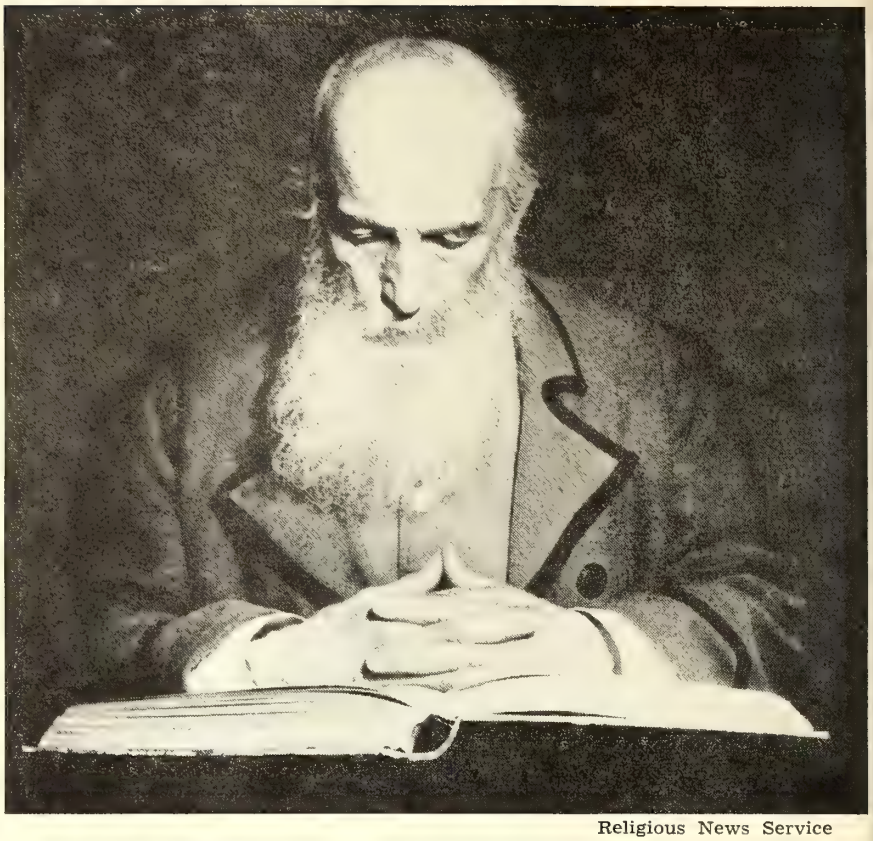
Senior student at Bethany Biblical Seminary

he: "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do so to them: this is the law and the prophets."

This statement of Jesus is a hard one for us—for a number of reasons. In the first place, doing unto others as we would have them do unto us is pretty rough. For most of us, that would mean doing quite a bit;

And in the second place, most of us in our sophistication would reject this answer from the lips of anyone else but Jesus. From the lips of anyone else we would call it humanistic. To sum up all the revelation of God through the law and by the prophets in terms of loving one's fellows—it is too simple! What a naive social gospeler he turned out to be! Little did he realize how completely the neo-orthodoxy of the twentieth century would shatter all such idle talk.

But this had been the law and the prophets. From Samuel to Jesus they had been saying it, in different ways—but essentially the same message.



Take Micah's familiar words—so familiar that they have almost become trite and lost their meaning:

"With what shall I come before the Lord, and bow myself before God on high? . . .
He has showed you, O man, what is good;
And what does the Lord require of you
but to do justice, and to love kindness,
and to walk humbly with your God?"

Or the version of Amos:

"Take away from me the noise of your songs;
to the melody of your harps I will not listen.
But let justice roll down like waters, and righteousness like an ever-flowing stream."

Jesus was restating what Isaiah found in his worship experience as it is recorded in Isa. 6. To meet God means several things: it is to be overwhelmed with a sense of his majesty and power; it is to realize one's own unworthiness; it is to be forgiven and experience renewal. But it does not stop here! To experience him is to be called by him. "Whom shall I send? Who will go for me?" And to respond: "Here am I, Lord, Send me."

Religious News Service

"The fear of the Lord prolongeth days"

It was the message of all the prophets. To experience God is to share his concerns in our world!

How easy it is to say that we believe in God. German soldiers through two world wars bore his name on their belts. And on the other side of the lines in both wars, chaplains and religious leaders were busy asserting the dependence of their side on the same God, indeed, justifying their cause by him. Even the American Legion has entered the show with a "Back to God" movement. Some of Hollywood's sexiest dolls make reference to his name. And a million juke boxes in taverns and joints from coast to coast sing his praises.

God has become quite the fad. It is like patriotism and motherhood—not even the meanest of men would object. "In God we trust," we glibly say. We mold it into our coins. We print it on our stamps. We even insert it into our pledge of allegiance. And we think it makes us better in the eyes of God.

How easy it is to say that we believe in God. How hard it is to accept his concerns and purposes.

The point is just this: as ministers and church workers we are all tempted here. How easy it is to mouth the right creeds, to perform the rituals beautifully and meaningfully—without flaw, to know the articles of our faith as the Watkins man knows his salves, to feed syrup to fat, comfortable Christians whose biggest sin is a damning sense of self-satisfaction.

It is relatively easy to be re-

The Higher Mathematics

IF A student answered ninety-nine questions correctly and missed only one, how would he regard a teacher who told him he had failed his examination? According to all standards for success, a percentage of ninety or more should guarantee a passing grade. But not for Jesus. He was always concerned for the one lost sheep, the one missing coin, the one prodigal son. He took little satisfaction in counting the ninety-nine who were safe in the fold, the nine silver coins that were locked in the vault or even the one son who never left home.

By all our standards Jesus failed to understand success. His arithmetic bothers us, even when he applies it to something else besides money. Should we not rejoice in statistical accomplishments, in adding numbers to our records or in raising our percentage of giving? Why did our Lord seem so unimpressed with even a ninety-nine per cent record? The reason seems to be that there is no satisfaction as long as someone is lost.

Jesus was just as impractical—from our standpoint—in dealing with human relations. Over against the worldly standards of tit for tat, eye for eye, tooth for tooth—the kind of balancing act we regard as justice—he set his impossible mathematics of forgiveness. Would not a sevenfold forgiveness be more than magnanimous, asked Peter. No, replied his Master, because there can be no limits to your forgiveness. Keep on forgiving, even to seventy times seven.

To live by the law of averages is to be merely human. But Paul reminded the scrapping Corinthians that Christians who are growing members of the body of Christ are called to be more than "ordinary men." Therefore, they are to live by the higher mathematics of the Christian life. They cannot discharge their duties to God or their fellow men by statistical accomplishments or even by achieving an average of good behavior.

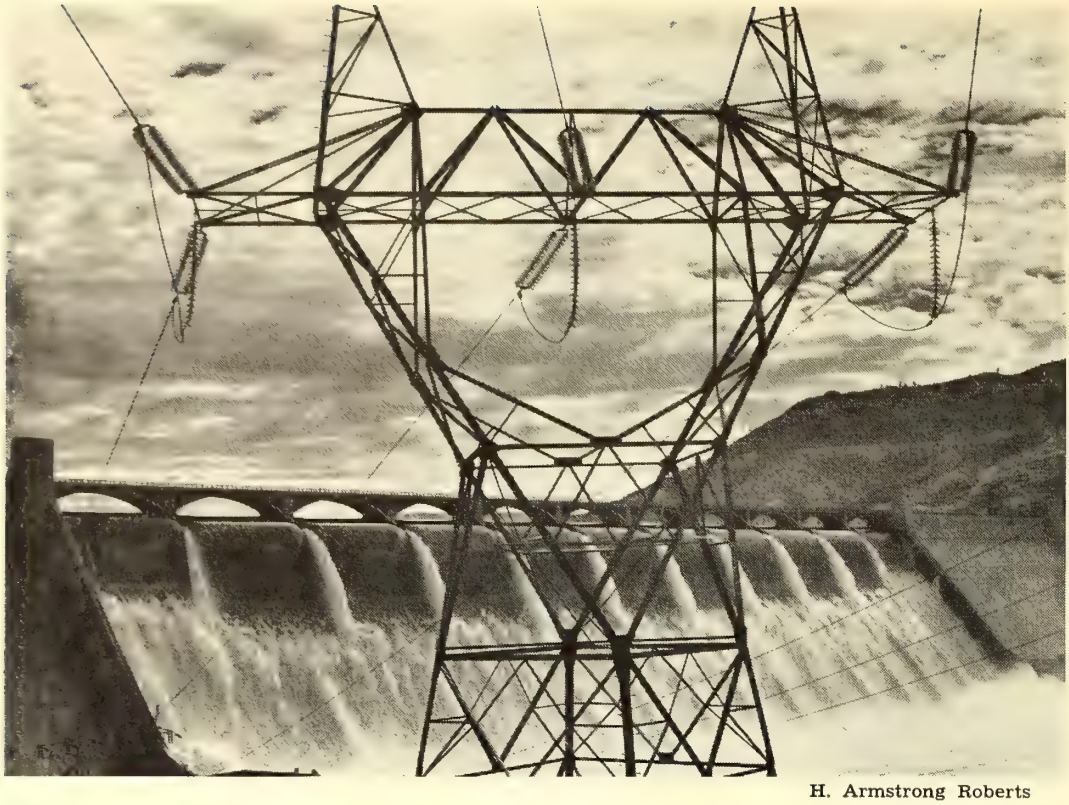
Suppose we applied the mathematics of Jesus to our local churches. Having baptized several new members and raised our percentage of growth, dare we commend ourselves for our evangelism? Not so long as hundreds of lost souls live within the shadow of our church. Not so long as even one has drifted from the fold.

But look at our wonderful record of giving. Did not many of us even go slightly over the tithe? Yet we failed, even percentage-wise, to match the widow's mite. And did we even sense the magnitude of giving as Jesus demonstrated it? He gave his life, not a percentage.

Then look how tolerant we have been—of the Communists, of the labor unions, of the politicians. Do we not deserve some kind of passing grade for forgiveness? Did we not pray for peace and did we not shake hands with strangers? But surely our Lord will remind us how often we wounded our brothers by our gossiping, how reluctant we were to seek reconciliation before we gave way to hatred.

There is no statistic in which a Christian can take comfort—in sermons preached, votes recorded, money given, buildings dedicated, budgets raised—so long as a lost sheep cries on the hillside or a lost son comes to the end of his rope. There is no resting from working or praying or giving in the kingdom of God so long as earth still refuses to receive her king.

Perhaps you cannot balance your budget or pad your wallet or figure your tax with the higher mathematics of Jesus. But it adds up, nevertheless, to a sum of joy that multiplies like the food he fed to thousands.—K.M.



Sunday Clothes

MY WIFE was determined that our children should look their best when we visited a distant church. Before we left for the week end she had each outfit complete on a coat hanger. Then she enclosed them carefully in a plastic bag so that our Sunday clothes would still be fresh and clean when we need them.

For once we were gratified to see the three boys walk down the aisle in their red corduroy coats, their white shirts and neat ties. The two girls were just as colorfully attired. The impression of immaculate appearance lasted almost through the morning services, but play clothes were on hand for a quick change when the children got home.

We have no objection to wearing "Sunday clothes" as long as they are simple and in good taste. But it is really disturbing to observe how many persons wear their religion as if it was appropriate only at a Sunday service. Maybe they are afraid of soiling their Christianity by exposing it in daily life. So they wrap it up and lay it away from Sunday to Sunday.

We ought to wear our religion as we do our work clothes. Prayer and service and witnessing should have the familiar feel that comes with daily use. And what better outfit is there for a Christian than a pair of overalls or a house dress?—K.M.

A New Testament Church for Today

The early church was a sharing, witnessing, committed, praying fellowship

Lloyd E. Evans

IF I were able to choose any generation in which to live it would be this one. It is an age of indescribable progress, quick decisions, shortened distances and intense speed.

Pick up your newspaper, turn on your radio or sit down in front of your TV screen and you will discover that we are living in an age that does things quickly and in a big way. Beer companies are spending millions of dollars to promote their destructive product. Yet churches are haggling over peanuts to promote the good news of Jesus Christ. Our government has long ago learned to speak in terms of "billions of dollars" for so-called "peace and security." But the church is still bickering over meager budgets which handicap us in making Christ available to people. He is the only real security available to man.

It is but little wonder that the voices of the newspaper and airway have become loud and strong and the voice of the prophet has become weakened to a whisper. The message of the church is becoming powerless, anemic, listless. We grasp business and have learned to throw our whole life into it. But we only trickle religion.

But still, through this faint whisper coming from the pulpit, we can detect the voice of God calling our churches and saying: "Move ahead, Church of God."

The Church of the Brethren, since the time of her beginning, has been what we commonly call a New Testament church. Alexander Mack and seven other followers of the Christ had hardly dried themselves from the water of the Eder stream before they took their Bibles, turned to the New Testament with the statement on their lips, "Now, let us see what Jesus would have us do." Is this the concern of Brethren today? How often have we said at the beginning of a conference, or at the outset of a new fiscal church year, "Now, let us go to the New Testament and see what Jesus would have us do"?

I approach the story of the Moderator's address given at the Michigan district meeting

early church recognizing that it is a dangerous thing to do. It can well mean that going to the New Testament will require changing the course of our entire lives. Is it possible to live in this speeded-up, materialized society and proclaim New Testament doctrines? I believe it is. But let us see.

If we are to be a New Testament church it is necessary that we be concerned about the whole range of human need. We learn that in the life of the early church "there was not a needy person among them, for as many as were possessors of lands or houses sold them; and brought the proceeds of what was sold and laid it at the apostle's feet; and distribution was made to each as any had need" (Acts 4:34-35).

We know, of course, that there were even a few scoundrels roaming about in those days. Many said, "Here is a good thing; join up with the church and we will be taken care of without working." But do not miss the central concern of the early church; they were concerned about the whole range of human need. That is New Testament teaching.

Last winter, my wife served as a substitute teacher for a few weeks in a small rural school about ten miles north of Midland. She discovered that there were some children in that school who were actually suffering for want of the right kind of food and they were in need of clothing. We had some of these children in our home on the Sunday nearest Christmas. All of these children were born within twelve miles of our city; the oldest was eleven years old. Yet, none of these children had ever been in Midland before. Going to church that morning was a new experience for them. There are children in like condition within walking or driving distance all over America.

I thank God whenever I see a Brethren Service truck back up to one of our churches and load up with used clothing. I am grateful to our good people who recognize the needs of people. But I am not so enthusiastic when I hear our people saying: "Well, there goes the truck; we have just served human need. Now, let's get back to another money-making scheme." Many of our church projects are centered around "How much will we make?" rather than "what can we do to meet the human need of our people?"

The more we can move into the area of serving the total need of our community, the nearer we will be to New Testament teaching, for it was Jesus himself who said, "Inasmuch as you have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, you did it unto me" (Matt. 25:40). We are pioneers in caring for the hungry, naked, sick, homeless, refugees and migrants. We dare not forget this and continue to lay claim that we are a New Testament church.

If we are to be a New Testament Church it is expedient that we witness. We earn in the life of the early church that "with great power the apostles gave their testimony to the resurrection of the Lord Jesus" (Acts 4:33).

This was no strange teaching to these early Christians for it was Christ himself who said, "Go therefore and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, teaching them to observe all that I have commanded you" (Matt. 28:19-20a).

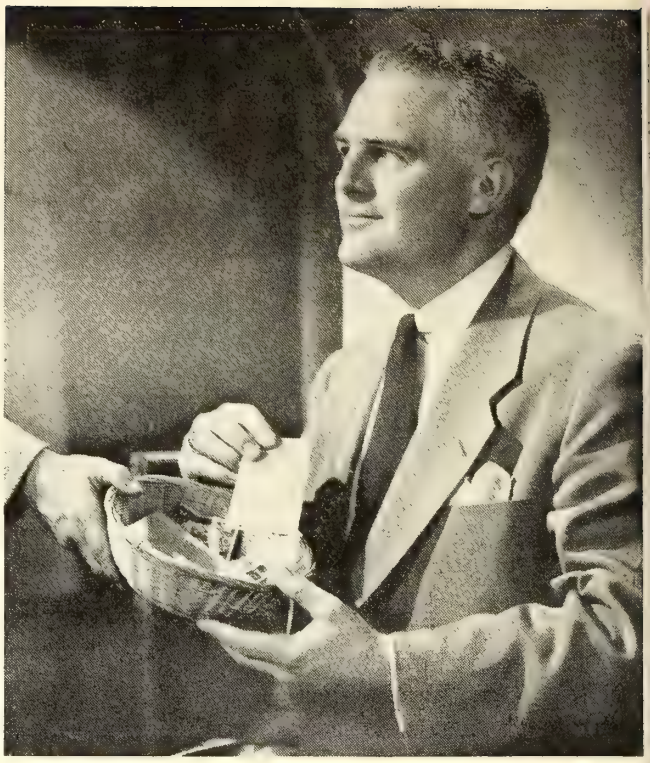
Can we say, truthfully, that we are a New Testament church at this point? I doubt it. What Jonathan Swift said expresses the attitude of many of our churches:

"We are God's chosen few,
All other will be damned;
There is no place in heaven for you,
We can't have heaven crammed!"

Dr. M. T. Rankin, executive secretary of the Southern Baptist Convention, told 3,500 Baptists gathered in a Memphis auditorium upon his return from China in 1950: "Communists offer an appeal of compassion to the dispossessed man. They have a sense of world mission. I have seen Chinese students of communism; sons and daughters of wealthy parents, put on padded garments and go out among millions of miserable, vermin-ridden country people teaching and preaching communism. One led before a Nationalist firing squad gave these for his last words, 'I die for a cause'."

Communism is a terrible thing. None of us would want to be found lining up with a group that denounces Christ, but how can we expect to defeat communism unless we can outmatch their devotion? I am not as

Religious News Service



To meet the human need of our community should be the concern of a church that would be like the New Testament church worried about the Communist in China as I am concerned about the church member in America who makes no effort to witness and live for his Christ. If we are to be a New Testament church, it is expedient that we witness, that we come to realize that a person outside of Christ and his Church is lost and in a hopeless condition. We must face up to the fact that we are carriers of the Good News. We have discovered the way out of lostness and hopelessness and unless we turn this message loose, people all around us will have no hope of living eternally with their Savior.

If we are to be a New Testament church it is urgent that we practice stewardship. Someone has said, "Do you mean to say that they tithed when the church first started?" They did more than that; they gave up all that they had. We know that this is not possible today. The methods of practicing stewardship differ. But the end result is the same.

Now in some areas our people are coming to life in the realm of stewardship. Churches, which in the past found difficulty in giving $5,000 a year to Christ are discovering that the same group of people, with just a little spiritual awakening within their lives, can now give twice that amount. Instances of increased giving are coming in from all over the Brotherhood. An interesting observation is this: where the giving has increased so has the spiritual fervor of the congregation also increased. Our giving and our spiritual growth go hand in hand. Nearly all of the bickerings which exist in churches today would be gone if our membership would come to a total commitment to Christ and his church.

Think for a moment of the opportunities that are coming our way. New families are moving into Brethren communities; comity commissions are saying, "Here is a new area of a few hundred homes. Can you Brethren build a church there and meet the spiritual needs of these people?" There is opportunity everywhere.

It is urgent that the church practice stewardship that is a total commitment of life, for then the spiritual fervor of the church will increase

Then think of our own resources. Man has never had such a rich life. We have the best in foods: fresh strawberries for Christmas and sweet corn for Easter. Consider our traveling conveniences. We can span the United States more quickly than our forefathers could travel across the county. We have the finest of automobiles; they are hardly considered complete unless they have a radio, heater, power steering, power brakes and countless other gadgets that provide for modern comfort. Or consider recreation. Did man ever have such variety? Hunting, fishing, golfing, football, basketball, baseball, swimming, guided tours, and radio and television for the "armchair" sportsman. All of this we have, and more too, with opportunities to serve Christ that are unlimited.

Two men were standing on the steps of their church after the pastor had lifted up the need for people to be good stewards. One of the men said, "Boy, do I ever get tired of that preacher continually harping for money! It sure does cost a lot to run this church." The other man replied, "Yes, it does cost a lot. Last year our son was in college and it certainly cost a lot. He required over $1,500 of my hard-earned money. But this summer he died. Now he doesn't cost me anything." This homely illustration might more closely depict the condition of our district than we think.

If we are to be a New Testament church it is essential that we have a praying church. We read of the early church, "And when they had prayed" (Acts 4:31). There was a time when prayer was as essential as breathing for the life of the Christian and his church. Prayer and its power is a New Testament teaching. Are we a New Testament church at this point? Ask yourself, "Just how much time do I spend in prayer?"

Prayer is the source of power for the church today. I suppose one of the greatest causes for frictions in churches today is a lack of prayer in our lives.

The spirit has died in more than one church. Where they once felt power and oneness, they have become lifeless and God seems miles away. Every church is always in danger of losing this praying, Spirit-filled atmosphere that fairly breathes the presence of God. It is tragic when it happens; the church loses her message; her power is gone; she then resorts to "playing church."

The opportunity is before us. The resources are here. Let us now dedicate our lives that we may do our very best. Let the Church of the Brethren really be a New Testament church. It is the most urgent need of our time.

The Heart of the Matter

ligious. And the duties for a "religious" leader are fairly easy to perform. But we can do them all and still fail when it comes to treating others as we would be treated—whether sinners or other nations or other races.

The priest in the Good Samaritan story as far as we know was a good priest. He probably loved the members of his congregation, was a good parish worker, an excellent administrator and all of that. But he flunked out! Not because he was not religious, but because he passed by his neighbor in need.

Even the Pharisees were religious. But Jesus said to them what he would probably say to us: "You blind fools! You tithe mint and dill and cummin. You traverse sea and land to make a single proselyte. But you neglect the weightier matters of the law, justice and mercy and faith."

The temptation is to dwell on ethereal matters, on respectable living—to be highly religious. But we fail to face the raw, hard problems of life where Christianity makes a difference. As in Jesus' day, it is so much easier to be a Pharisee than a disciple, so much safer to be a priest than a prophet.

There is a movie entitled On the Waterfront. The plot centers around the violence to be found on New York's docks. In the story is a Catholic priest. The film begins with the murder of one of the workers who had squealed to the crime commission. The priest is called in to pray over the body. As he leaves, he turns to the sister of the murdered worker and assures her that if there is anything she needs she can find him in the church. To which she becomes quite angry and asks him point blank what kind of a church it is that runs away from people and their problems and asks that they come to it.

There are several threads through the story, but throughout is the struggle of a priest to decide whether his job is primarily in a building of stone and mortar or down on the waterfront where God's people toil and sweat and spend their lives.

Dear Family Counselor,

Although my need is along spiritual advice, I would like your counsel. Our pastor doesn't believe in the blood atonement and I believe it is essential to salvation. He also says praying for the sick will help only if the sickness is caused by the mind. My mother seems to think we should stay by the church and I'm considering another church which will almost break her heart, but the Bible teaches we should obey the true word rather than man. I let them know how I believe without being dogmatic, but don't think I serve any denomination that does not follow the Bible. Please help me to make the right choice.

Confused.

Dear Friend,

Perhaps it is more a difference in the words used than in belief. It is possible your pastor believes as you do but uses a different way of expressing it. Surely all of us believe it is the life of Christ and his sacrificial death on the cross which revealed the true nature of God to us, drawing us to seek forgiveness for our sins and to dedicate our lives in loving service to God for life.

None of us believes any of us is good enough at best to stand in the presence of our Holy God without having been cleansed in the blood of Christ, symbolized by baptism with water and the Spirit. This cleansing is brought to our remembrance again and again as we wash one another's feet and take into our bodies the symbols of his body and his blood at our love feast and communion services.

The creed of our church is the New Testament—we believe and practice its teachings as led by the Spirit of Christ. One of these teachings is that of the anointing service for the sick (Jas. 5:14, 15). What a blessing it proves to be to those who enter into it in faith! There are no limits to its possibilities. However, the will of God is our ultimate desire as children of God. It is not his will that we live forever here on the earth. Heaven is our real home. Birth and death are both a part of God's all-wise plan, so we will not always get well even though we are anointed. The only thing of importance is that we desire above all things God's will.

Paul had some physical difficulty, a thorn in his flesh (2 Cor. 12:7-13), which, though he prayed for its removal, remained with him and he was given grace from God to bear it and grow spiritually because of it.

I have found great joy serving Christ in our beloved Church of the Brethren and I hope and pray you will continue to be a part of its fellowship. We have the liberty to follow Christ as his Spirit directs. We do not all need to express it in exactly the same words or forms.

His Kingdom in My Kitchen

Even in regard to household tasks we must learn to say, "Thy will, Father, not mine, be done today."

Ernestine Hoff Emrick

DEAR FATHER, on this second day of my search for your kingdom in my kitchen, I awoke refreshed and eager for the adventure with you. This may not seem especially newsworthy to those who are accustomed to bounding energetically out of bed in the morning, but for me it is nothing short of amazing. For years, the process of awaking and facing the prospect of another day's duties and problems has been quite a struggle, with my first waking hour usually spent in fighting my way dully through a maze of mental cobwebs.

But this day was different. Washing the breakfast dishes was a time for stretching the soul into closer contact with you.

Dimension

My home domain is not so wide
But it is very high;
Though closely held within these walls,
It reaches to the sky.

And while my restless soul must stay
Behind the kitchen sink,
It still can soar in Godward flight,
Much freer than I think.

Now, Father, what is your bit of leaven for me this morning and what are your orders for the day? My old dilemma again comes crowding in unbidden. A book I have been longing to read beckons me as does some writing I need to do, but the clothes hamper has long since overflowed and the cupboard is even more bare than yesterday.

And how shall winged soul and feet of clay
Inhabit mortal man in harmony,
Not tearing him asunder in a fray,
But merging in a blessed unity?

It seems as if there is always some household task standing between me and what I want to do. Wait! Father, you say the clue to my conflict is right there in that statement? Yes, there it is: ". . . what I want to do." I should have said, ". . . what you want me to do." But then I could not say that sentence at all, could I?

I think you are trying to tell me that each household task is what you want me to be doing at that particular time and not a hindrance to it. Yes, Father, I must learn to say, "Thy will, not mine, be done," even in regard to housework. And so I will include it without rebellion in the plan for my day, thus making it truly your plan, not mine.

When Jesus said "If any man would come after me, let him deny himself" (Matt. 16:24), I

Many duties of housekeeping are acts of cleansing, putting things in order and discarding waste: dusting, mopping, laundering, washing dishes, mending, making beds, scrubbing, sweeping—all are in the nature of remedial or repair work and must be repeated frequently to keep the house livable think he meant that a man must deny his Self (spelled with a capital S), that self-interest that psychologists call the ego. This little pencil with which I write has suddenly become a silent example.

The Selfless Pencil

My pencil gives itself away
As these few lines it traces,
Then, turned upon the other end,
Its very self erases.

Some people speak of this giving one's self away as "surrender," but I like to think of it in terms of selling or renting a house:

Sold!

My spirit-house was not for sale
The day my Lord sought lodging there;
My sign said only "Room for Rent"—
I had so little space to spare.

For years a renter in my house,
He came and went at my request.
And then I sold it at His price—
Now He is host and I am guest.

Thank you, Father, for making this step more of a reality in my life today.

It certainly is odd the way the clock has stopped racing around. Or perhaps it is just I who have stopped racing around. I actually had our huge washing on the line by 10:00, another outstanding accomplishment for me—or perhaps I should say for you, because without you it would have taken me till noon, even with my usual frantic haste. As Glenn Clark says, "Our cargoes only come to us over calm seas." Mine have been rather stormy of late, and I have no doubt that many of your precious cargoes have capsized and never reached port. Father, I pray that you will continue to still the waves in the days to come so that I may receive all that you ship to me.

There was time for grocery shopping before lunch. I shall never take for granted our amazing supermarkets. What a feeling of security and abundance it is to help one's self to those colorful, orderly shelves stocked with more food than we could eat in a lifetime! What if we could go shopping occasionally in a supermarket of Christian virtues . . . "Let's see, my supply of patience is running very low right now—I'll get a one-pound can of that. And humility—I'd better get two boxes of that so I have some on hand when my frequent visitor, Pride, comes calling. And I must be sure to pick up the large economy size package of love—I never seem to have enough of that . . ."

When we had seated ourselves at the lunch table set with the most delectable food items we had bought, my young son suddenly decided not to partake of them, and logical argument only increased his determination. How often, Father, do you prepare a table before us, set with your choicest blessings and we perversely refuse to reach out and claim them for our own, thereby cheating no one but ourselves!

Father, I am sure you are aware of the way small boys, filled with good intentions, try to "help mommy," with results that are slightly less than helpful. For instance, when they decide to wash the back porch windows, mommy's plans undergo a slight alteration as she finds the necessity of washing windows too. But then perhaps she can learn something from this also.

Transparent

I washed my windowpanes today—
Erased their blemished hue,
Then marveled how they disappeared
And glory flooded through.

Make me a thing invisible
Through which Thy light can shine,
Unmarred by my own pseudo-sheen,
Revealing only Thine.

Two men came to our house today—the milkman to collect our bill and the trash man to carry away our refuse. Unlike the milkman, you do not come back to collect payment from us for your daily delivery of benefits, for they are the free gift of your generosity. I know you will not be offended, Father, when I say that at times you do act somewhat as a "holy trash man," carting away our discarded vices, unlovely habits and thoughts that we no longer want to have cluttering the premises. In fact, this is one of your more important functions, as it clears the way for the occupants to live a free and joyous life in their renovated house.

With more persuasion than action, I had a little help in picking up toys, straightening the house and vacuuming the rug this evening. How many duties of housekeeping are acts of cleansing, putting things in order and discarding waste: dusting, mopping, laundering, washing dishes, mending, making beds, scrubbing, sweeping—all are in the nature of remedial or repair work and must be re-

The Churches and Constitutional Rights

Eugene Carson Blake

OUR history makes it clear that one of the very important streams flowing into the river of American liberty is that religious one which springs up out of the soul of a man in the presence of his God.

When at the end of the eighteenth Century our forefathers were creating the political instruments of American freedom, many of their most creative ideas had come down to them from ancestors who had fled their homes in the continent of Europe or the British Isles as their only way of escape from religious persecution. Before their forced emigration these men had had their fill of penalties imposed upon them by government for their opinions and beliefs. They were tired of being ignored or even punished for having had the effrontery to petition a hostile government for the redress of their grievances.

Modern ideas of tolerance were not widespread anywhere in the eighteenth Century, but it is clear that as the United States was being founded, men of very deep religious conviction joined equally with more secular minded people in an endeavor to find a way to set up a government strong enough to resist anarchy, which gives way always to tyranny and yet not so strong as to become tyrannic itself. This was and is the problem of liberty, how to create a government able to protect the liberties of all its citizens from one another and, at the same time, unable to usurp their liberties itself.

A new idea grew out of the unique combination of religious conviction and the then "modern enlightenment." It was the acceptance by both churchmen and other citizens of the concept of limited sovereignty. During the Middle Ages in Europe the struggle had long continued between church and state as to which ultimately should control the destinies of men and nations. The struggle seesawed between Canossa and Avignon. The theory of the ultimate and absolute sovereignty of the church was countered at last with the theory of the divine right of kings.

It was clear that the American revolutionists could not accept the divine right of George III of Great Britain, and too many of them had had experience of being a religious minority in an ecclesiastically dominated state to be willing to chance any religious establishment.

And so it happened that both the American state and the American churches accepted the idea that both were under the authority of the same sovereign Creator of all men and nations.

An address delivered before a special Constitution Day session of the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights by the president of the National Council of Churches and stated clerk of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A.

As a churchman, may I say that it is my belief that for the liberty of men and the prosperity of religion it is equally important that churches recognize their human limitations as it is for civil governments to recognize theirs.

Besides the sovereignty of God there was another important religious idea that was set into the framework of American liberty. It was the doctrine of sin—I dare say it, of the depravity of man. If the most "advanced" political ideas current at the end of the eighteenth century had been the only influence that had framed the American Constitution, I am afraid that with a much more logical and efficient government we would not have had our liberties quite so well protected as they have been. Because they took seriously the doctrine of human depravity, the religious founders of our nation made it certain that powers were so balanced in their new government that no absolute and corrupting power could find its way into the hands of an individual or even a large group of individuals without there appearing a counterweight sufficient to preserve the liberties of the people from any tyrannic minority or even from a tyrannic majority.

It was thus out of a unique combination of religious conviction and "modern enlightenment" that the American tradition of church and state was formed. And I am, therefore, happy to express to you, as a churchman citizen, some of the concerns shared by many churches in the area covered by the Bill of Rights.

I do not wish to make a long or exhaustive list of "grievances." First, (let me underline the chief concern. Let no government or branch thereof think of itself as the arbiter or controller of men's opinions, convictions or faith. No free man will allow his convictions, religious, economic or political, to be controlled by the state. Let government remain the servant of the American people, not their master. Let no part of government forget that it along with the churches and the people is subject to the judgment and justice of Almighty God. Let us even in the most trying of circumstances exemplify the humility of Abraham Lincoln, who in the Civil War was not so bold as ever to identify the cause of the Union with the will of God. And I speak as a Yankee whose two grandfathers were captains in the Grand Army of the Republic.

In recent years there has been a committee of the House of Representatives on Un-American activities. Although I do not presume to assess the value of this committee in the development of information needed by the Congress for legislation against subversive threats to our country, I am compelled to say that many of the side effects of this committee's activities have caused most churches grave concern. Let me list the reasons for this concern.

1. The very name of the committee raises a question. For there has been a growing tendency on the part of our representatives in government to suppose that it is within the competence of the state to determine what is and what is not American. But from the beginning the glory of the American way of life has been the encouragement of diversity of conscientious opinion and conviction and American law is concerned with overt, illegal actions only.

2. The committee has used techniques in hearings which have in effect turned the witness into one accused, and has not afforded many a witness an opportunity or the means to protect himself and his reputation, means which even a legally indicted citizen is afforded in any court.

3. The committee has failed to distinguish between allegations of disloyalty and proved disloyalty.

4. Unsupported allegations, which could have been easily proved false, have on occasions been disseminated on the committee's letterhead to the hurt of the reputation of loyal Americans.

5. The committee has been itself confused as to the difference between disloyalty to our country and the holding of opinions which happen to be politically unpopular or publicly embarrassing.

6. The committee has on occasion lost all historical perspective, implying disloyalty for past associations of some citizens, which associations at the time when they occurred were shared by other citizens whose loyalty it would not dare at all to challenge.

I have used one committee of the Congress and its activities as an illustration of a kind of governmental action which is of grave concern to many of the churches.

Let me, in order to be entirely fair, take an illustration that causes some concern from each of the other branches of the Federal Government.

A proposal was made a few years ago by the chief executive of the nation that diplomatic relations should be established with the head of one of the Christian churches. All of the churches in the United States (except the one it was proposed to recognize and it took no official position on the matter) were deeply concerned and made their concern vocal enough so that nothing came of the proposal. Whether or not such diplomatic recognition can be fairly construed as contrary to the First Amendment may be a moot question. But that is not the point. Such a recognition must be justified on the grounds of one church having a preferred position in the world religious scene or on the grounds that there were nonreligious reasons sufficient for it. Most American churches would be against such a recognition on either ground, even if it were proposed that equally important diplomatic recognition was offered to their own churches. And this on the basis of the clause against establishment or preference of one religion or church as against another. In the Constitution of one of our American churches, which was first published in 1788, these words occur:

"That 'God alone is Lord of the conscience; and hath left it free from the doctrine and commandments of men, which are in anything contrary to his word, or beside it in matters of faith or worship.' Therefore they consider the rights of private judgment, in all matters that respect religion, as universal and unalienable: they do not even wish to see any religious constitution aided by the civil power, further than may be necessary for protection and security and, at the same time, be equal and common to all others."

I have used but one illustration from the executive branch because it is of such basic concern to religious equality in the United States. There are many other problems in the executive branch, on which there would be more unanimity on the part of the churches as to abuses that threaten us all. I merely mention the extraordinary power exercised by the Attorney General in establishing a list of subversive organizations, the control by a bureau of the issuance of passports to free citizens and the injustice suffered by many loyal Americans by inadequately safeguarded security procedures.

Finally, let me express one concern in the judicial realm. I speak with great hesitation. The churches of this country have confidence in the Supreme Court that it will continue to interpret the Constitution in such a way as will protect the religious liberty of even unpopular and splinter minorities. But in this process we must confess to a fear that in order to do this, the Court may tend to change this nation from a nation under God to a completely secular state in which the law is interpreted as creating a gulf between religion and government, which it was never intended should exist. Most American Christians would prefer this error than the contrary one which would allow the state and its instruments to be used by churches for their ecclesiastical purposes. In education, for example, American Christians believe in the primary responsibility of parents for the religious education of their own children. They believe in the right of churches or private individuals to set up schools of their own for these purposes, but most American Christians believe this right does not include governmental financial support for them. But this ought not to mean that the public, tax-supported school must be irreligious or nonreligious or antireligious. The Constitution ought to protect the public schools equally from sectarianism and from secularism. This is not easy to do. Some decisions of the Supreme Court have come closer to the churches' ideal in this regard than others. And it will be a continuing concern of the churches that the cause of faith shall not be set backward by the development of a tax-supported public school system whose values are determined by the state at a humanistic level rather than by the American people under a faith in and guidance of Almighty God.

Let Heaven Come In

PATRICIA KENNEDY HELMAN

Heaven is near us: the strength of a tree,
The song of the bird, the vast open sea;
Let not my spirit be dulled by life's din;
Open my heart; let heaven come in!

A word kindly spoken, a child's winsome grace,
A friendly warm handclasp, a mothers' sweet face;
Let me love deeply, more nearly like him;
Open my heart; let heaven come in!

God gives us heaven through all of life's hours,
The grandeur of mountains, the beauty of flowers,
This is my prayer; cleanse me from sin;
Open my heart; let heaven come in!

peated frequently to keep the house livable. If I would spend just a fraction as much time each day, Father, in setting my spirit-house in order, it would be an infinitely neater and more pleasant place for you to dwell.

And now comes the blessed moment when I can lay my head gratefully on the pillow of your love and slip into oblivion, secure in the knowledge that "He who keeps Israel will neither slumber nor sleep" (Psa. 121:4). I am beginning to realize that housework has spiritual implications of which I never dreamed. Perhaps I shall dream of them now. Good night—and thank you, Father, thank you.

In Our Own Way

George W. Wright

WE DO not need to paint the end of a telescope to keep from seeing the stars. If we just breathe close to the lens the moisture in our breath will obscure our vision. Very often the narrowness of our vision and our selfish-laden breath keep us from reaching the real goals and the fulfillment of our dreams. Like the misplaced finger near the lens of a camera, we often obstruct our own view of the real values of life.

The rich young ruler had set his sights upon a noble prize, the kingdom of heaven, but his riches had loomed so large in importance that his vision was distorted. Demas had started out as a companion of Paul but the lure of the present world had been too challenging. Judas Iscariot would be honored today as a faithful disciple had not greediness and a desire for an earthly kingdom obliterated the true purpose of the Master's coming. So it is an old, old story of getting in our own way.

We may not be able fully to understand the implication of the Master's words, "If your right hand causes you to sin, cut it off and throw it away," but we do know that in spite of our best intentions we sometimes find ourselves taking a lower road. We reach for the stars but fail to light our little candle. We adore the Light of the world yet hide our flickering flame under a bushel. Something in our nature persistently keeps bobbing up to distract our attention from lofty ideals and abundant living. Why must we ever be getting in our own way?

Paul knew well of this experience as he confessed, "The things I would do I do not, and the things I would not do, those I do." But he also had a solution. "I fight daily to keep my body under subjection," and therein is our secret of keeping ourselves out of our way. We must ever be on our guard that selfishness and selfish ambitions must be shackled and controlled lest they rob us of the better things of life. Jealousies, envyings and hatreds have completely ruined many lives of sheer joy and happiness. Faith and prayer are noble allies to the individual who would make the best out of his life. Loose tongues and ill-chosen words often destroy the value of a parent who would be an example to his children. A hasty temper can befog the mind and sanity as surely as our breath cheats us of our view of the distant vista. Let us diligently try to keep ourselves out of our way.

This little volume is one of a new series—World Christian Books—written by outstanding scholars from different lands, designed to present the great fundamentals of the Christian faith in language the average layman can understand. These books are being printed first in English, but as soon as possible, they will be made available in the main languages of the Christian world for it is hoped these little volumes will be of special benefit among the younger churches and to those who preach and teach the Christian faith everywhere.

Bishop Neil gives a brilliant summary of what I have learned about God in my own studies of theology and philosophy. He re-asks and answers many of the puzzling questions that men raise about God. God is presented as Life, Light, Love and the Spirit. The closing chapter, Three in One and One in Three, will help you in understanding the doctrine of the trinity. The only question I would have about the book is whether the author actually included enough of the divine in-breathing of Gen. 2:7. Probably, if he could be questioned about the matter, the author would agree that it includes at least the capacity to receive the gift of eternal life. The book will be useful for private study and as an elective unit for youth and adults.—C. Ernest Davis.

Christian Theology: An Ecumenical Approach. Walter Marshall Horton. Harper, 1955. 304 pages. $3.75.

By the grace of God, we Brethren have come to a state of repentance over our long and proud neglectful ignorance of theology. And here is a book which will go far toward meeting the need for a good, readable text on theology which Brethren can read and study to their immense edification.

The book deals with the Great Christian doctrines: The Knowledge of God, The Nature of God, God and the World, God and Man, Christ the Savior, The Church and the Means of Grace, The Christian Hope. Three questions are asked concerning each of these doctrines: (1) What is the basic ecumenical problem within this doctrine? (2) What is the universal Christian answer to it, as agreed upon by the churches? (3) What disagreements and conflicts interfere with a clear Christian answer to this problem?

The book is interesting, lucid, well-reasoned, seasoned with profound Christian understanding and faith. The author is professor of theology at Oberlin, a great leader in ecumenical thought, a convincing writer. He has given us an extremely valuable book.—Edward K. Ziegler, Roanoke, Va.

IDEAS—PLANS—METHODS

Recreation in the Church Program

Kent E. Naylor
Warrensburg, Missouri

Bill Smith

Church people should play together as well as worship together

BECAUSE church facilities are not always adequate, it is necessary for every church fellowship to examine its own particular equipment and plan activities and recreation to suit best its needs and possibilities. However, limited facilities need not hinder having some type of recreational program.

Recreational programs in the church should help to mold the group together into an agape fellowship ("where love may abound"). Further, recreation should include activities that will interest each age group. This suggests that the activities will be varied.

Purposes for Recreation

Recreation is not an end in itself. Recreation should be a well-planned part of every church program. The youth programs stress four phases of a well-balanced program: work, play, study and worship. These four phases of a church program should lead us to a greater understanding of the will of God for our lives. It will develop the potential that is in us and become an integrating factor in the life of the church.

One of the youth in our youth fellowship suggested a party and, in the planning, he wanted to end the party in a spirit of worship and personal commitment to the church program. This meant that his concept of a party meant integrating the flavor of recreation and seasoning of spiritual experience. They go together. Recreation is a vital part of the group experience. Much preparation is needed to set the stage for such an experience. The party will have progression of activities—from active games to quiet games to group singing, concluding with hymns which are conducive to the worship experience of the party.

In the total program of the church, emphasis should be placed upon the idea that recreation does have a real purpose. Many have believed recreation is for the young folk! A recreational program in the church is inclusive. This means that the types of activities should help to make people feel at home with one another. Recreation in its best form stimulates intelligent thinking and directs the emotions toward creative action. Some programs of recreation tend to overemphasize the emotional side of the activity. This deadens creative thinking. Recreation helps the congregation to forget self and to act as a group in creative patterns. Many individual conflicts could be resolved if the group actively participated in group recreation. Differences in people will be minimized and their likenesses and joys will be heightened.

One of the ways churches can give positive voice to an age-old saying, "Recreation is for the young folk," is to promote family nights. A family night provides an excellent opportunity for all ages to combine talents and interests and to play together. Occasional banquets for dads and sons and for mothers and daughters also provide opportunities for sharing of interests.

Variety Presupposes Creativeness

Variety is necessary to the well-being of the church program. Recreation may provide some of that variety. If the pastor would preach the same sermon each Sunday for a month, many would lose interest. The same is true with the recreational program—musical games or any other types of activity will not be effective if used every time the group gets together.

There are times in which activities should be planned for a specific age group. For example, boys and girls like hiking or craft work, and it would be well to provide a special period for them from time to time. There will be times when a class or group will want to sponsor a party for the whole church. Encouragement should be given to each group in the congregation to plan a social for the entire church family. This helps to develop leadership and initiative within the various groups. Occasionally an evening should be set aside to share hobbies or to learn a new hobby or skill. This type of program is always very profitable.

We need to do much thinking and planning for the successful approach to our church recreation. The above are only a few of the many things that can be done.

In the thinking of the writer, the church and its activities should be family-centered. Families are becoming too accustomed to having their members go their own individual ways. The church should encourage family solidarity and unity. Someone has said that at least one half of a person's recreational activities should be carried on within the home unit. Another guide to recreation within the church would be that the members should participate in as many activities at the church as they do in their community. This means recreation will need to be well planned.

Recreational programs vitalized in the church life will encourage a balanced life of creative activity which forms an essential part of our spiritual living.

Recreation is the art of replenishing life's springs with renewed energy, creative thinking, spiritual growth and abundant living. The church program is enriched through a well-balanced and organized recreational program.

Who Is My Pastor's Pastor?

IT DAWNED on me the other day that my pastor has no pastor, no human shepherd to whom he can turn when the days are dark.

Like most church members, I have called my pastor when there was need, and he has never failed me. But who is his pastor? Who rushes to his side when the load is heavier than he can bear alone?

Is there not something within all of us which cries out for human sympathy and understanding? Is my pastor an exception merely because he is my pastor?

The Savior, on earth, turned aside to talk with the Father and spent long hours with him who meets his servants in the secret places and who never forsakes them. But our Lord also needed John and Peter and James and the others.

I have made a resolution which, by God's help, I will not break, I am determined that my pastor shall know that I love him, that he shall not lack the sympathetic understanding which I can give. As a member of my church, I shall, in some way, be a shepherd's friend. I can but believe that there are many others like me who will, day by day, stand at the side of the man who has no pastor.

—Western Recorder.

Shall I Be an Inactive Member?

VERY few members of a church have ever asked this question: "Shall I be an inactive church member?" Inactivity of church members is more a result of unconscious drifting than of deliberate intention. Whatever the cause, the result has been tragic in many lives. Consider this example related by a pastor which I came across in a minister's magazine:

"A few years ago, in a city far from here, a father came to my study saying that he wanted to know if his name was still on our church rolls. We discovered that it had been put on the inactive list some ten years before. He thought soberly for a time and then said, 'Ten years ago?' 'Yes,' I replied, 'that seems to be it.' Then he poured out his story, telling what he had been doing during those ten years, of the work he had done, of the money he had made and of the way he had been using his leisure time. Then he added: 'I suppose you read in the newspaper of that liquor store robbery which took place down town the other night. They have found out who did it. My boy was one of the gang. For ten years I let my boy see me forgetting God and the church; for ten years I let him see me work in the fields on Sunday just as on any other day; he saw me with my friends; for ten years he smelled liquor on my breath every time I came home from town; for ten years I've been telling him, as well as showing him, that I believe that life is simply what you can get out of it and it doesn't matter how you get it. For ten years I let him grow up without knowing the things that would have kept him out of this scrape. He's not a bad boy, but I'm a poor father. Pastor, tell this story as often as you care to, for it may help some other father and some other boy.' So, I tell it, knowing that it carries its own moral." (From Pulpit Preaching, April 1955, pp. 20-21).

An indifferent, inactive member gives the world as well as his family an unworthy example

I know you share my prayer that nothing of this kind will ever happen to any of our homes. Think, though, how the indifferent, inactive member is giving the world as well as his family an unworthy example. He is missing the blessing of wholesome Christian fellowship and the hope of eternal gain.

When a church member is inactive, the church, the community, the home and the member himself all suffer. When he takes an active part, all gain and he has the inner satisfaction of doing what is right.—John Weaver in Potsdam, Ohio, Newsletter.

Fraternity church, North Carolina, honored its members who have reached the golden age (seventy or over) by a special service in late August. This service was planned jointly by the pastor, director of music and the worship committee. Appropriate music and a worship center of beautiful flowers were arranged for the occasion.

During the service the pastor read the names of those who had reached the golden age. The worship committee had provided a basket of white carnations and each honored person present was given a flower. Several unable to attend sent flowers.

The sermon was especially for the older people, but it applied to the younger ones as well. The message was entitled The Last of Life. The theme of the message was how to grow old in a constructive way, emphasizing these points: (1) We are all growing older. (2) The last years of life should not be wasted. (3) As we grow older, we should prepare for death.

In the planning of our church program for the year, we often have a special day for children, for young people, for married couples, for laymen and others. Why not include a special day for those who have reached the golden years of life? —Paul R. White, pastor.

Charles Lunkley reports

Meeting of the Christian Council of Nigeria

THE tenth meeting of the Christian Council of Nigeria was held on the beautiful campus of the Nigerian College of Sciences and Technology near Ibadan. The college is about four miles outside of Ibadan, which is the largest African city south of the Sahara Desert. The campuses of both the Nigerian College and University College, which is nearby, have in the last three or four years been hewn out of the jungle and the new, very modern and distinctive buildings of the two schools erected. The entire conference was held in the classrooms of the Nigerian College.

The Church of the Brethren mission delegates: Stover Kulp, president and presiding chairman of the Christian Council of Nigeria, Dr. Roy Pfaltzgraff, Mrs. Ada Good, Mr. and Mrs. Harold Royer and Charles Lunkley, probably traveled the farthest of any delegates to the conference, about 3,000 miles round trip. The trip was made by car over the rough muddy roads of Nigeria, more than two thirds of the way on dirt roads, in the height of the rainy season. However, there was very little delay along the way.

The Christian Council of Nigeria is a co-operative council of churches and missions of the entire country of Nigeria. The Church of the Brethren mission has been a member of the council since its founding. There were ten missions and churches and at least seven other Christian organizations represented at the meeting this year.

The Christian Council has been able to co-ordinate the efforts of most church and mission activities in Nigeria and there have been several co-operative efforts either under the direction of or with the support of the council, such as evangelistic campaigns, theological training schools, union mission training hospital, youth leadership training, united effort against unchristian activities in the country and the building of the Protestant chapel at the University College.

The council has also taken active part in the issue of religious freedom in the Northern Region of Nigeria, in which the Church of the Brethren mission is located. The council now employs a full-time secretary who is already overburdened with the many tasks of such a job.

The Christian Council meeting was preceded with a Christian Rural Workers' Conference, which, while not a part of the council meeting, did report its findings to the latter for consideration. The Christian Rural Workers' Conference was attended by government, church and mission personnel who made an earnest effort in their discussions and deliberations to find ways to help the rural people of this rapidly changing country.

The first two days of the meetings of the Christian Council were taken up with the meeting of the various boards of the council; medical, educational, rural affairs, youth work and theological. In these meetings the churches discussed present work, problems, future plans and prepared reports for the plenary sessions of the Christian Council meetings.

By the third day of the meeting there was a great increase of delegates, who were divided into four study and discussion groups: evangelism, worship, social service and Christian marriage.

These discussion groups considered new materials available in their fields, present activities and problems faced by the various members, and ways of advancing the Christian way. Each group then prepared resolutions and recommendations to be presented at the plenary session of the meeting.

Briefly, the council recognized the need for greater evangelistic effort, particularly within the laity. They re-emphasized the doctrine of monogamy as the only form of Christian marriage. They pointed out the danger of secret societies. Considerable time was spent in discussion of the future of missions and Christianity in the new constitution and after independence. Particularly was this centered on the situation in the Northern Region, where so far they have refused to include a religious freedom clause because of Moslem domination.

The relation of the church to politics was also discussed at some length. Finally the recommendations and resolutions of the different groups were combined and co-ordinated or discarded until the final draft of the resolutions of the council were completed and approved for recording.

There were a number of side lights to the meeting proper which were also of considerable value. The addresses of the Chief Olubadan of Ibadan, the premier of the Western Region Chief the Honorable Obafemi Owolowo, and the acting governor of the Western Region, each emphasized the need for united Christian action in the next few years of effort to adjust to independence. The reception which the premier held for the entire delegate body and officials of the Christian Council at the grounds of the House of Assembly set a note of encouragement for the future relationship of church and government at least in the western area.

Holy communion in the new University College chapel, which was built by the churches through the Christian Council, was a blessing as we worshiped together in remembrance of our Lord. The spirit of brotherhood in Christ was strengthened as many of us went to worship services and brought the Word of God in the churches of Ibadan and surrounding towns.

The mass meeting in the public assembly hall set high on a hill in the city of Ibadan was a high point of inspiration and an example of the unity of the church. On Sunday afternoon the Christian people of Ibadan, some two thousand strong, assembled in the hall, many church congregations walking in a body bearing their church banner up the steep hill to the auditorium, to participate in a service that lasted almost two hours.

This tenth meeting of the Christian Council of Nigeria was both challenging and informative. Above all, it showed that though the church is young in Nigeria it is, nevertheless, active, growing and forward looking. It will make its impression on the church of the world in the future.

Christians and Political Development in Nigeria

This statement was issued by the Christian Council of Nigeria in June 1955 with the hope that it might serve as a guide to the Christian people of Nigeria in their activities, in their prayers and in the spirit in which they react to the important political changes of these days. Church of the Brethren missionaries are very active in the Christian Council of Nigeria.

THE Christian Council of Nigeria desires once more to call the attention of Christian tian people to their duties as citizens and to remind them of those moral and spiritual principles which should guide them in the discharge of their political obligations.

1. We call upon all Christians to take an active part in establishing good government, such as will be most suitable for the development of the people of this land, not forgetting to pray that the political life of our country may be in accordance with the will of God. To this end we would impress upon all Christian people that it is their duty as Christians and as citizens to exercise their right to vote.

2. We believe it is the will of God that the country should enjoy good government, that is, that it should have government which promotes the physical and moral welfare of the people by efficient planning and administration, makes justice available for all, secures freedom of opinion and worship, and protects the freedom and rights of conscience of minorities. Nigeria should demand that these duties are faithfully discharged by any party in power to the best of its ability.

3. The church contains people of goodwill who hold different views on the affairs of their country and support different political, economic and social programs. The church, therefore, cannot become identified with any party or program. She does not condemn any party so long as its objects are in accordance with Christian principles and the means employed to reach them are beyond reproach. The question of joining any particular party, however, must be left to the Christian conscience of the individual.

4. Good government requires that there should be sufficient men and women of ability and integrity for the control of the administration at the top and for the execution of its orders at other levels. Every Christian should set an example to others by his truthfulness, honesty and kindliness, both in the elementary duties of citizenship and in the more responsible offices of the state. Christians are called to recognize that they hold their possessions, talents and any authority given to them by the civil community as stewards, who in the end are accountable to God. They are required to be faithful stewards before God, which makes a bigger demand than faithfulness to party or even country and is a great safeguard against the abuse and misuse of power.

5. Good government also requires the understanding co-operation of the governed and their confidence in the integrity of those who are called to rule. The spirit of impartial service for all, which is a special product of Christianity, should be the mark of all public servants. Bribery and corruption should be banished by the vigilance of the authorities, the faithful witness of the church and the absolute refusal of all citizens to take or offer bribes.

6. All men are equal before God and have the right to fair and just treatment, based on respect for human personality. The law of Christ condemns every kind of discrimination, arising from racial, tribal and class distinctions.

7. We urge all Christians constantly to keep in mind the kingship of God over the whole of life, and the obvious necessity for man always to seek the will of God in social, economic and political life. Christians should never forget that patriotism is not enough and that, while we are creatures of time, we also belong to eternity; while we live on earth, we have no abiding city here; while we are subject to man's rule, we are disciples of life's eternal King; and that while new things are springing up about us, the gospel challenges us ourselves to become "new creatures in Christ."

8. It needs always to be remembered that the voice of the people is not always the voice of God and that good government can never of itself produce the kingdom of God on earth.

Wendell Flory writes from India: "Just recently the district meeting assigned a committee to do some youth work. We had a youth camp in May at which thirty-one were present. I hope to visit all of our twenty-two churches in the next year and try to make some suggestions for a stronger youth program."

A Plan Worth Sharing

Visitation teams devote one night each month to calling in the community, upon inactive members and upon prospective members

THE office of Ministry and Home Missions has just received a local church's plan for evangelism that is worth sharing. It is the plan of the evangelism committee of the Kansas City church, Mo., of which Floyd E. Bantz is the pastor. The plan depicts an intelligent use of fellowship and visitation evangelism. What may be unique in the plan is the recognition of the committee of the evangelistic value of a new church building in a community. The committee has set up a plan that assumes that the new building is more than a work of art that is a credit to the architecture of the area; it is also a place where families can meet God; it is a place established to share Christ within the community.

Recognizing that the plan will need to be examined from time to time in order to improve it, the committee presented a plan in two parts. The first part is the plan to help the community to become acquainted with the church. The second part of the report outlines the actual plan for visitation.

Introducing the Church to the Community

1. One month or so after the building has been started, circulate throughout the community an attractive folder telling about the new church moving in, what it will be, giving a picture of the proposed finished building, listing services it hopes to render; and so forth.

2. Three months before dedication, blanket the community again with another circular that will give much the same kind of information as above. This information must all be short and to the point and must be attractively done.

3. One month before the dedication service, send the whole community an invitation to the dedication and open house in the afternoon. Feature the building as a new community addition worth their visiting even though they will not necessarily intend to use it.

4. As soon as we start worshiping there, send out teams of people to visit the community and make a house-to-house visitation which should be simply a "get acquainted with our church" visit.

5. Begin immediately to work the unchurched homes once they have been discovered. Send church school teachers to homes of children in their age group to invite them to church.

6. Every two months cover the community with an attractive folder with pictures and illustrations, perhaps stories, about the church and its work. All these folders or circulars could be the door knob hanger type and would not so easily be lost or ignored.

7. The dedication should be preceded by worth-while newspaper advertisements and radio spot announcements.

8. Consider seriously the use of youth evangelism teams the first summer we are in the new building. This should be followed as soon as possible by a BVS worker who would work with the age groups in weekday and Sunday activities.

9. Develop a community program of age group activity to attract the children of the neighborhood.

10. Set aside enough money each year in the budget to have this program operative.

11. Get four groups of visitation teams that will devote one night each month to visiting the community and inactive members and prospective members. Four groups of teams of two each will make it possible for a group to go each week. Meet at the church for supper, have instruction and then call. This program should be kept constant and continuing.

12. Set up a monthly fellowship dinner at the church with a worthwhile program. Then assign prospects and interested people to other couples to invite as their own special guests to the fellowship dinner. One problem now is that less than half our people are effectively worked into any type of fellowship arrangement. These dinners should be something more than just the usual potluck and get together.

13. Organize and put into effect a transportation system for elderly people and others not located near good transportation to get them here. It is not enough to say, "Call me when you want a ride."

Plan for Visitation

1. Selection of thirty-two people by the evangelism committee who will give one night a month to personal visitation work.

2. Divide these into sixteen teams of two each. Teams will be appointed by the evangelism committee.

3. Set aside each Monday night and free that night of all conflicting church activities.

4. Assign four teams (eight people) to a given Monday night each month. On that Monday evening, that group will meet regularly, not occasionally. They will be given instruction and cards with names of people to be visited.

5. These teams will also call regularly in the community.

6. Members of the teams will be asked to let nothing except illness or accident interfere with attendance on the night they accept service.

Special notes: This method will mean that no person will visit more than one night a month, but that some team will be going out to visit one night a week. The program will be under the general supervision and guidance of the evangelism committee: Donald Scofield, chairman, Cecil Gibbs, secretary, Clara Kienberger.

Covington—A new program was tried this summer at our church. Sunday school was discontinued over the school vacation and church services were held from 9:00 a.m. until 10:15 a.m. We found several advantages to this method. Everyone seemed to enjoy the change in the program. We also found that when school began and a regular schedule was once more under way that everyone was happy to attend again. On Sunday, Sept. 25, three deacons and their wives were installed. They were Brother and Sister Jack Hare, Brother and Sister Lee Ruple and Brother and Sister Pat Anderson. We are looking forward to completing our grounds and building, establishing a completely centralized treasury, forming an active youth group and stressing a stronger program of evangelism—James Goodspeed, Covington, Wash.

MARY GARBER

From the pen of the author of Brethren Story Caravan comes this new heartwarming story of the experiences of one family in raising a heifer for relief. While this is a narrative of one family's experiences, it could be a composite of all those who provided heifers. Thousands of families throughout the United States co-operated in the Christian, humanitarian and far-reaching program that provided food —and hope—to so many needy families in other countries. This is indeed a story for entire family reading. Children will be delighted with it. Beautifully illustrated. Every church library should have a copy. 88 pages. Cloth. $1.75

A MAN AND HIS BOOK

IF A Dutch artist of the seventeenth century had chosen to paint the picture of a man reading his Bible, his masterpiece would not have differed much from this photograph of a farmer in Holland. We can imagine the attention that Vermeer might have given to the minor details, and the strength of character that Rembrandt would have discovered in the man's face. Yet even the photograph captures some of these qualities.

By the way this Hollander sits and holds his Bible, you understand that it is his one book: he probably desires no other. There is something timeless and universal about a devout Christian's loving regard for his Bible. Yet it is not the print or the worn leather binding or even the particular translation that counts most, but the eternal Word that breaks through the barriers of language and custom to speak to the hearts of men.

A Letter of Thanks

To all local parishes of the Church of the Brethren in the United States of America . . .

It gives me much pleasure and I am greatly honored to extend to you herewith my most sincere thanks, also on behalf of the community of Schwarzenau—a community which is of special importance to your church—for the generous gift which has been turned over to me in my capacity as the mayor of this town, by Director Zigler of Geneva, during an hour of celebration which has touched our hearts.

You will probably have been informed in the meantime about the development of the program in Schwarzenau on Sept. 4. Even the newspapers as well as the radio have honored this event.

If I am permitted to express myself in a more personal manner I would like to say that the feeling of gratitude for your great willingness to share and sacrifice as demonstrated by this gift is very much alive within myself. May I assure you that I shall never forget this! And you may also rest assured that I shall see to it that the gift will be used in such a way as outlined by you.

As you all know, the school situation in Schwarzenau was no longer tolerable, for the children of this community are still receiving their instruction in a hundred-year-old building which does not meet modern requirements at all. We have already been making plans since quite some time to build a new and better school, however, the realization of this plan has always failed because of the lack of the necessary funds. But now, this plan which we have cherished for such a long time is finally becoming reality! I want to point out on this occasion that your generous gift represents a very essential factor in the realization of our plans. I believe that it will give you great satisfaction to know that your gift will help promote better education for the young people of Schwarzenau.

We are looking forward to having representatives of the Church of the Brethren in USA visit our community in the years to come and when they come to see the new school they will notice the name Alexander Mack School on the wall of the building, and in the hall they will read a special inscription in honor of the founders of your church. I know that for you people Schwarzenau represents part of your religious homeland and I am very glad for the fact that every effort is being made by our community, in co-operation with the local Protestant church, to give all of you the feeling that you are very welcome to our community at any time!

I am closing this letter being convinced that the good relationship between your church and our community will continue to be deepened if at all possible. I am sending greetings to all of you welcoming you to the community of Schwarzenau any time you may want to visit us. It is my firm will and desire that we do everything possible in order to make the tie that binds your church and our town an everlasting one.

My heart is so filled with gratitude that I cannot think of more proper words to express this feeling. May God bless you and all the parishes of your church in your worldwide program, for all the times to come!

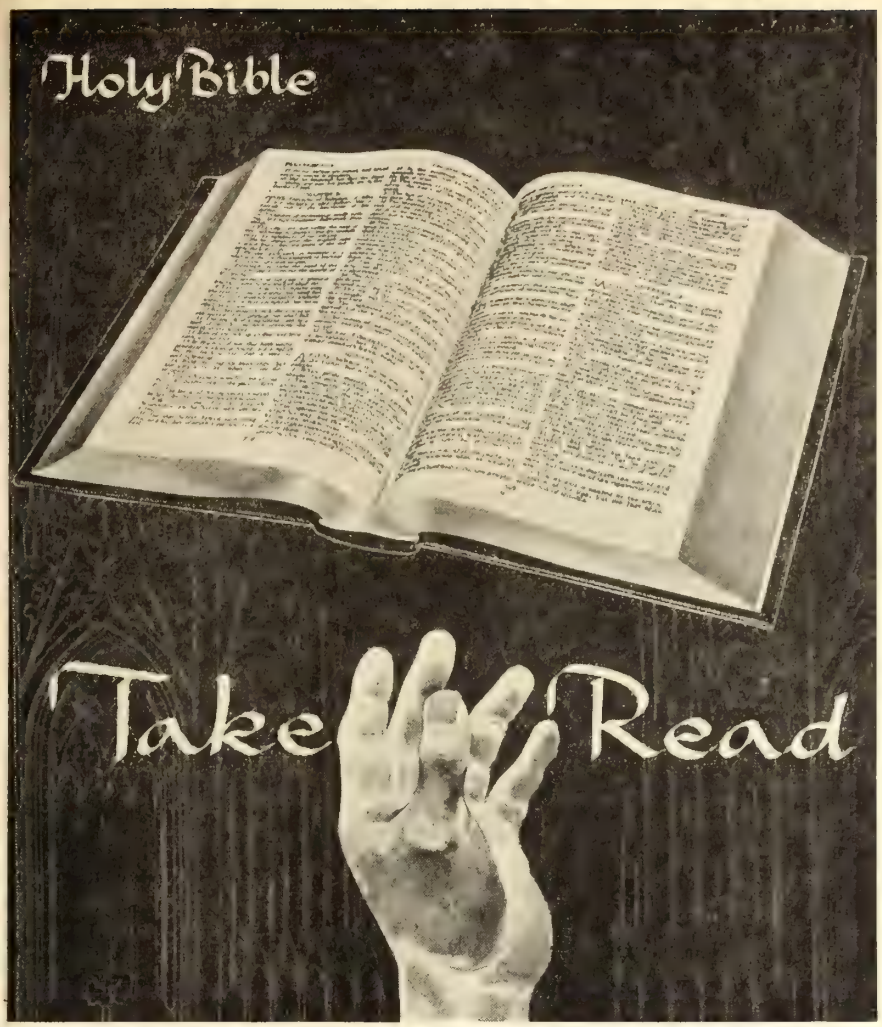
Mayor of Schwarzenau



Good News

Waiting in my mailbox one November day were the Messenger and the daily paper, two frequent visitors to my home. With open mind I welcomed them to speak of the latest news.

Since the daily paper is larger and bolder, she spoke first. "Jealousy, hate, murder! Anger-murder! Fear-murder!" My heart sank; my mind clouded. She wanted to go on and on for she prides herself greatly in her ability to gather startling news and tell it in a presumptuous way so many people will listen.

Turning towards the Messenger I remembered her reputation of truth. Although she is smaller and doesn't speaks as often, when her turn comes she speaks valiantly of faith, hope and love.

Then the Messenger told me of a young girl who believes "The Lord Is Our Refuge." She kindled my courage. My workday was brightened when she told how a mother confirms "Mothering Is Big Business." The story, "Leadership Training Bears Fruit in Nigeria," renewed my belief in my fellow men.—Mrs. Robert Rhoades, Covington, Ohio.

WE ARE in the twelfth year of our emphasis on World-wide Bible reading from Thanksgiving through the Christmas season. This year's theme comes from the often-told story of the conversion of St. Augustine, who overheard some playing boys call over and over, "Tolle, lege," meaning, "Take up and read." He applied them to himself and immediately went to his room and took up a copy of the Epistles of Paul. His eager eyes fell on the words from the thirteenth chapter of Romans: "Not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying: but put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh, to fulfill the lusts thereof." He read until the direction of his life was changed.

The Bible is the most precious inheritance of our Christian faith and the most important resource for Christian education. Therefore, ignoring it is serious business, yet widely ignored it is. There is much spiritual illiteracy because of the failure of so many to enjoy a vital experience of God in Christ, which begins in their failure to practice the holy habits of the Christian religion, of which Bible reading is one. Let us take up our Bibles and read and discover afresh its enduring values.

Dwight L. Moody has been quoted as saying, "My greatest spiritual experience was reading Ephesians through forty-seven times in a month." Martin Luther once said he studied the Bible as one gathers apples. First, he shook the whole tree so that the ripest fruit might fall. Then he climbed the tree and shook each limb; and when he had shaken each limb, he shook each branch, and after each branch every twig. And then he looked under each leaf. These men of God took the Bible and read it and it became for them a genuine source of renewal for their spiritual lives. It gave to their lives illumination, guidance and control. Bible reading and study will do the same for us.

We do not actually own anything until we make it ours. Owning a Bible means reading it every day, and letting its message speak to us. World-wide Bible reading between Thanksgiving and Christmas is a good time to make a start.

Where do you keep your Bible? Does it have a working connection with your home? your heart? your thinking? your friendships? your daily life? your attitudes? your dreams?

Reading requires thinking. If we read the Bible properly we must think deeply, quietly and often; we need prayerfully and searchingly to seek to know the Author. Holy men of old under the guidance of God wrote it. The Word has been preserved down through the ages at great cost and suffering. It is a most precious heritage. But it will be valuable to us only when it is received into our hearts forgiven and cleansed by God and allowed to bring forth fruit in godly living for him. We read the Word of God to find guidance, strength, peace and grace to live joyously, victoriously and vicariously. Therefore, read thoughtfully, seek to understand the meaning the words had for Jesus, John and Paul. Try to understand what these words meant to the martyrs and the persecuted of all ages, to our fathers and mothers. Ask yourself: What is God saying to me by the words of Holy Writ? Take, read.

Pastor of the Lebanon church, Pennsylvania, and a contributing editor of the Gospel Messenger

Take your Bible and read it in your homes, to your children. Pity the mother who does not see religious obligations as larger than teaching her child to say, "Now I lay me down to sleep." America needs nothing so much as the moral and spiritual revitalization of our homes. Scripture and experience both insist upon the leavening power of religious teaching and worship in the home.

Worship within the family circle is more fundamental than church worship. Home worship and church worship flourish or fall together. The excuse that because of our hurried living there is no time when the family can get together is too tragic for belief. There is always time for the things we deem vitally important. We must take upon our hearts such injunctions as this one from the sixth chapter of Deuteronomy; "And these words which I command thee this day, shall be in thine heart; and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up."

Take your Bible and read it as a resource to face new issues, new demands upon the Christian way of life. It is one of the tragedies of traditional religious education that those who come up through the teaching ministry of the church know so little about the Bible and are unable to use it fruitfully in their own religious living.

As individuals and as communities the ancient Hebrews and the early Christians faced at different levels of their development and under concrete historical conditions actual situations which life presented to them. They arrived at the solution of the issues which these situations presented in the light of their growing conceptions of God and the world and of their convictions about the meaning of life in its responsible relation to God.

The literature of the Bible, distributed over a period of more than a thousand years, is the deposit of that experience. It is the record of man's search for God and of God's search for man at the point of their interaction in man's experience of the world of reality. We need to understand the functional relation of the Bible to experience and realize that, because the Bible was begotten in life, it was at the point of its origin THE LIVING WORD. Only as we are led to see and feel this relation can it again become for us the living word through its functional use in meeting our own situations today.

The Bible can be a guide for Christian living. Mere knowledge of the content of the Bible or of facts about the Bible is not enough. Beyond knowledge about the Bible lie effective attitudes and the fruition of these attitudes in actual reconstruction of personal and social living. The Christian conduct of life is the end; the Bible is a means to that end.

Take your Bible and read it and find its message of authority. The Bible is so much more than a book. It is a power. It causes something to grow in our souls. God speaks to us. The crowning glory of the Bible is the person of Jesus Christ. He is the secret of its power. Though no man can explain him, every man who has yielded his life to him has found himself in the presence of God, has found the fuller meaning of life, has found peace and that sense of dynamic security we call salvation.

Don't forget to read the Bible,
In the early days of youth,
Every morning, every evening,
Fill your minds with sacred truth;
Read the Bible, read the Bible,
For a guide to you is given;
Read the Bible, read the Bible,
It will lead you up to heav'n.

Has your heart grown sad and weary,
Full of sorrow, grief and care?
"Come to me, ye heavy laden,"
Take your Bible, read it there!
Read the Bible, read the Bible,
It will lead you up to heav'n.

Graham Says Yes, Moody Said No

EVANGELIST BILLY GRAHAM is a newsworthy figure whose actions and comments are of interest to most of our readers. For this reason we have included frequent reports of his campaigns in our news pages. As we have observed his growing popularity and influence we have been impressed with his sincerity, his passion for winning converts for his Lord and his eagerness to co-operate with the recognized church leaders of each community in order to present the claims of Christ.

Our interest in keeping our readers informed about Billy Graham does not mean that we endorse all his doctrinal positions or approve of all his methods. He has certainly been willing to profit by his experience; he is apparently humble in the midst of the kind of publicity that would turn many a man's head; and he has avoided many of the pitfalls that ensnared other evangelists when they became public attractions.

Because of such qualities a few of our readers think we ought not to criticize a man who does so much good. Yet we believe we should point out that even Billy Graham, though the Lord may use him in a remarkable way, can be mistaken. We believe he was wrong in telling the Veterans of Foreign Wars in August that America should "pray for peace but be prepared for attack. We must never strike the first blow, but we must be able to strike the last one." There is not too much difference, however, between striking the first or waiting to strike the last blow if that action is in itself contrary to what we understand to be Christ's way of overcoming an enemy. The basis of our survival in any conflict, let it be noted, is not our ability to strike the last blow but rather our loyalty to the will of God as taught by Christ himself.

When a young Britisher, who was troubled in conscience about joining the army, asked for Billy Graham's advice, the evangelist's London office urged him to take whatever military service was suggested. This advice is in sharp contrast to that of another American evangelist with whom Billy Graham is often compared. Dwight L. Moody was a young man of twenty-four when the Civil War began. There was pressure for recruiting soldiers. His friends and converts enlisted and Moody was urged to join up. But instead he said, "There has never been a time in my life when I felt I could take a gun and shoot down a fellow-being. In this respect I am a Quaker."

In this respect we hold with Moody and differ with Graham, though we welcome the sincerity and devotion of each in his efforts to win men for Christ.—K.M.

Ready to Receive the Bible

THE doorman at the television theatre was puzzled. He was accustomed to admitting actors in strange costumes and workmen with all kinds of equipment, but imagine his consternation when three men with a police escort arrived on a Sunday afternoon to deliver—of all things—a Bible.

No wonder he asked them to remain in the lobby while he telephoned backstage for instructions. Several minutes passed before the man with the Bible in a tan leather suitcase could be admitted to the studio and even longer before the Bible made its television debut.

The doorman discovered later that the police escort was needed because the New York Public Library rather reluctantly agreed to let its most valuable volume—a rare copy of the Gutenberg Bible—be televised as a part of a program depicting the Renaissance. The Bible, one of forty-five surviving copies of Gutenberg's work, had been removed from the library only once before. For its two-minute appearance on television and its carefully escorted trip, it was insured for $500,000. The library was taking no chances on losing its most precious possession.

The Bible is a precious possession. It is a treasure, however, that can be discovered just as readily by the man who reads its words of life in a paper-bound edition as by one who has access to the vaults where libraries keep their rare volumes. The trouble is that so many modern Americans are like the television actors who, according to one newspaper account of the incident, were "so busy rehearsing that no one was immediately available to receive the Bible."

This is the time of Bible Sunday and the season for world-wide Bible reading. The theme of this year's observance is Take, Read. If we fail to take time to read, we may forget to take heed of the eternal message—the good news of Christ's coming—and life will continue to be an empty show before the world's sharp cameras. But if we seize the opportunity now, not only for a Sunday or a season, but for the future, we can find our roles in a drama no television program can ever capture, the living drama of God's love as it still makes its appeal to men through the pages of the Bible.—K.M.

His Kingdom in My Kitchen

III

Ernestine Hoff Emrick

Heilman

The beauty of flowers is a witness to God's tremendous creative power

DEAR FATHER, "Thy kingdom come on earth" —and even in my kitchen. This is the third day I have prayed thus to you. Will you reveal yet other spiritual truths to me through my routine household duties?

The past three mornings you have awakened me at exactly 6:00, the first time such a thing has happened in my lifetime. You must mean, Father, for me to arise and have a quiet hour with you before the rest of the family begins to stir. So this morning I took the hint.

The hour was filled with a chapter on love in Starr Daily's book, Release, followed by the love chapter in your Book, written by another man whose life also was drastically changed by your great love. It seems we must sit at the feet of a former hardened criminal and a one-time persecutor of Christians to learn the matchless quality of love, for they can more fully comprehend it by contrast, through their acquaintance with violence and hate. So as my bit of leaven for this day, I "above all these put on love, which binds everything together in perfect harmony" (Col. 3:14).

Washing the breakfast dishes used to be a time the radio was a necessity to fill the vacuum in my thoughts.

VOICES

Radio gives washing dishes
Just the proper blaring noise;
How the quiet housewife wishes
For a soap commercial's joys!

Moments when no word is spoken
Merit but a stifled yawn;
Empty silence must be broken—
Turn the television on!

Click of dial, twirl of fingers—
Thoughtlessly we make our choice,
Deaf to Him whose Spirit lingers,
Shutting out His whispered voice.

Now I am learning to use the time as an occasion for tuning in to heaven's wave-length, where you are broadcasting. Like our radio stations, you are sending out messages all the time; it remains for us to tune into the proper wave-length or your precious communications will not be received. And, oh, how many strains of your celestial harmonies I have missed, Father, while listening to the banal dissonances of earth via radio!

The first order of the day for my small son was a jigsaw puzzle. And this necessitated having mommy near at hand, sitting with eyes closed so she could open them on signal and be surprised at each new step in progress made. So while the pieces of the United States map were falling into place, mommy with eyes closed also assembled the pieces of her day into an integrated picture. And the love of which she had read earlier helped her to "unite all things in him" (Eph. 1:10).

Yesterday's activities were more in the nature of remedying and repairing, cleansing and regaining order. Today I was more creative, bringing beauty of sight and taste into being. My first joy was cutting and arranging gladiolas in a brilliant mass of floral flame upon the coffee table. The sunlight of your love has transformed a wrinkled brown bulb into this miracle of bloom, just as it can do with a seemingly unpromising human life. The one requirement is that we respond to its warmth and not remain fearfully hidden in the safe darkness of the surrounding soil. Father, let this spot of beauty be a witness, not to my ability to arrange flowers artistically, but to your tremendous creative power, so that those who come will see in it more of you than of me.

As I was ironing, a fly kept buzzing around in an annoying fashion. For a moment it represented all the little irritations that keep me from peace of mind. When I finally allowed it to light on me, of course the buzzing stopped. Perhaps if I accept the irritations for the small things that they are and stop trying to fight them off, they will cease too.

Then, strangely, my ironing board underwent a sudden transformation from a barren plateau into an altar, high and lifted up, where garments must submit to the chastening ordeal of intense heat, becoming symbolically a "fragrant offering, a sacrifice acceptable and pleasing to God" (Phil. 4:18). From henceforth, Father, ironing day will be for me an occasion of repentance, for laying upon my kitchen altar a broken spirit and a contrite heart, for these are the sacrifices you will not despise (Psa. 51:17).

The arrival of our new mail order catalog brightened the day considerably. I must admit that a certain faraway look crept into my eyes as I leafed through page after page of well-chosen creations. But then our Tabby-puss ambled sedately across the room and unwittingly improved my attitude on the matter of attire.

GOWN OF CALICO

Miss Tabby wears a gown of calico,
Rough-patched in black and white and tawny glow.
For some, such humble garb would injure pride,
But she can walk with proud and queenly stride
As if in jet and gold and ermine clad—
Of royal robes the finest to be had.
Thus innocent of envy, she can purr,
Content with what her Maker gave to her.
May I accept my lot with equal grace,
Well satisfied to fill my lowly place
Devoid of shame—and wearing, as I go,
With dignity my "gown of calico."

As is the way of energetic young lads, hammers are sometimes employed in a manner for which they were not intended.

Love's paradox is this: that one small boy
Can be at once both my despair and joy!

How privileged we parents are, Father, that we have the opportunity through handling the problems of our children to understand more fully the difficulties you have in dealing with your earthly children. Since watching my child use a hammer to destroy rather than to build, I now know better how it must grieve you to see your adult children using their tools to bring hurt and devastation when they could serve constructively to help and heal. And it is easier to be tolerant of a little boy who runs away from me when it is time to take his medicine if I pause to remember how we grown-up children often try to escape you, Father, when there is a dose of bitter medicine to be swallowed.

The last major piece of my day to fall into place in my jigsaw puzzle was the baking of a cake for the church ice cream social. Although I am always happy to donate time and effort for the church, I have been too long in realizing that a minister's wife must be on guard lest the proportion for home and church become unbalanced in favor of the church. Thanks to another wiser pastor's wife, I have recently come to the conviction that in a minister's home, and perhaps in any other, our concerns should come in this order: (1) God, (2) husband, (3) children, (4) church and (5) community. Father, in the past I have considered you and the church identical, as if being busy in church activities were, in fact, maintaining a close personal relationship with you. And in equating the church with you, I have mistakenly felt compelled to place loyalty to the church program above the best interests of my family. Now I know that I must find you elsewhere than in a breathless whirl of church activities, worthy as they are, and that I must seek you intimately in a quiet place, for you are a "Father who sees in secret" (Matt. 6:6). If I would hear you speak, I must be still long enough to listen.

And now that I have baked a cake for the church, lest I once again be guilty of putting church before family, tomorrow I shall bake some cookies for my son.

SMUDGES

"A cookie for my son," I greeted him
As grimy little hands reached eagerly,
"—But first the soap and water!" Soon a blend
Of smudges graced the towel carelessly.
With countenance of shining cherubim
He shouted as he hastened to depart,
"I love you, mommy, you're my best girl-friend,"
And left a cherished smudge upon my heart.

This brings me logically to the subject of cooking, my "hardest nut to crack," and I can postpone it no longer. Father, I earnestly ask you to show me a spiritual significance in the preparation of meals. Yes, of course! How could I not have seen it before? Hereafter, Father, may I serve my family, in addition to their daily bread, a generous helping of that manna of the soul—the staple, all-essential bread of life. Each morning this particular bread-maker has been absorbing a bit of leaven to help her rise. Is not, then, the ability to impart this spiritual food to others the logical fulfillment of her moments with him who is himself the Bread of Life? And so now I have the two concluding lines for the couplet which began my first recorded day:

A bit of leaven helps a woman rise
To view her daily tasks through spirit-eyes.
With this enlightened sight, she then can feed
Her family the bread of life indeed.

I shall be forever grateful, Father, for the revelations of these days. With continued nearness on your part and more "sanctified imagination" on my part, perhaps we shall make further discoveries together and see more parables in the commonplace.

And nevermore shall housework be
A meaningless monotony!

Thank you, thank you, Father.

THAT BLESSED HOPE

VELMA D. COLLINS

I know there is, eternal in the heavens,
A house not made with hands, prepared for me,
And all the hopelessness that sinning leavens
Shall never enter there. . .nor ever be. . .

The glory that my Father is preparing
Eye has not seen, nor has the heart perceived,
But he reveals the joy beyond comparing
That is in Christ in whom I have believed.

Although my eyes may see the sun's bright setting,
My heart is with the dawn. . .the morning glow. . .
The valley of the shadow stirs no fretting,
For Christ walks with me to withstand the foe.

Within this body of humiliation
There burns the spark that sets the spirit free
To walk in faith toward that glad consummation
When death is swallowed up in victory. . .

When I shall stand with Christ in his perfection
And know the power of his resurrection.

The Bible did not create God: God working in history through men created the Bible. Every passage needs to be studied in the light of the interpretation of God given to us in the life of Jesus

The Wrapping and the Gift

AS WE are caught now in the rush of wrappings and gifts, perhaps we can use these as figures of speech to give us a clue to a better understanding of our Bible. Nels Ferré, a contemporary theologian, has said, "Jesus Christ is the supreme gift given to us in the wrapping of the Bible." Martin Luther presented the same truth using another figure of speech, "The Bible is the manger in which Christ is laid." More simply, Jesus is God's gift. The Bible is the wrapping. There are today different reactions to this wrapping.

First, there are those who do not like certain little things about the wrapping. And because they do not, they make the great mistake of throwing out the gift. Among these are included many of our educated sophisticated moderns who have not liked the bloodshed, superstitions, teachings such as the world might be flat, some primitive concepts of God and some minor contradictions contained in the Bible. In other words, they have not liked some things about the wrapping. But in throwing away the wrapping they have also thrown out the supreme gift of the Bible, namely, Jesus, the Christ, the gift of abundant life. Simply because we do not like some of the wrappings on our packages and think they might have been improved in color or design, how foolish would it be for us to throw away our gifts.

Second, there are those who have a false worship of the wrapping. They are like the baby so allured by the wrapping that he cannot distinguish between the package and the gift. Some so worship the wrapping that the Bible instead of Christ becomes the object of their devotion. Recently, those who have burned Bibles have done so out of a false worship of one particular wrapping. These folk have not been able to separate the spirit of Christ from some parts of the Old Testament, the letter from the spirit, and the form from the content. We should remember that the wrapping has been changed many times, in various translations, to enable people to discover more easily the gift, Christ.

If we should neither throw away the wrapping or worship

The problem of secularism will be solved when the majority of people accept the doctrine that all things come from God and that each one is a divinely appointed steward to administer whatever goods may happen to come under his authority

God or Mammon

Roy L. Smith

SHORTLY before his death Harold Laski, the philosopher of the British Labor Party, said that never since the dawn of recorded history had one nation so completely dominated the life of all the world as did the United States in 1945. Because of the fantastic power the people of the United States exercise over the nations of the earth, we have become obsessed with "the powers of this earth," and we have been betrayed into thinking that life can be made out of an abundance of things.

Yet never in all the history of the earth has any people enjoyed such economic abundance and, at the same time, suffered from so much spiritual confusion. Ours is a generation of psychology, complexes, psychosomatics, slogans and sleeping pills. In spite of the fact that we are more generously provided for than any generation before us has ever been, that we are equipped with more labor-saving devices and have more leisure than any previous age ever dreamed of, that we spend more for entertainment than our fathers spent for the necessities of life, that a higher percentage of our people have had the advantage of college and university training than the world has ever known heretofore, and that we are enjoying a level of life incomparably higher than that to which the race has ever before aspired, yet our most frenzied quest is for peace of mind.

The time has surely come to talk courageously to the people on the subject of money. We are armed with the best of precedents in the teachings of Jesus. Again and again, by parables, direct comment, and outright doctrine, the Master dealt with the problem of money as though it were central in his thinking. The Apostle Paul spoke out with equal forthrightness on the subject of money, declaring that the love of it was the root of all evil.

The great apostle does not condemn money as such. He nowhere in his writings indicates that he sees any virtue in poverty. He would not have organized any order or brotherhood dedicated to penury. No one knew better than he did what vast services consecrated funds might render for he was the sponsor of the first great relief fund ever raised by the Christian church—a fund that was used to relieve hunger, and not for the purpose of purchasing property, establishing endowments or installing stained glass. Neither Jesus nor Paul ever condemned any man because he was rich, nor did they commend anyone because they were poor. Any stricture either Paul or Jesus delivered on the subject of money was at the expense of those who were unable or unwilling to administer their funds to the glory of God.

It is the undue and unholy emphasis on money which identifies secularism as the besetting sin of this generation. Solve the problem of money in the life of either the individual or the generation, and you solve the major social, as well as personal, problems with which we must contend.

At the present moment the problem of alcoholism is one of our most serious national problems. In the lives of millions of people it is the foremost personal problem. But if it were possible to extract the profits from the liquor traffic we could solve the problem of alcoholism almost over night. We would put an end to the deceptive and seductive advertising. We would denude drinking of its glamour. No longer would it appear to be smart and the correct thing to do.

Find some way of inoculating the American landlord with the spirit of the kingdom of heaven, as Jesus dreamed of the kingdom, and the problem of slum clearance would be set forward fifty years and the problem of juvenile delinquency would be brought that much nearer a solution.

A very large share of the color clash, domestically and throughout the world, is economic in character. The white man, having succeeded in raising his standard of living, stands in terror of the competition of the man of color. For that reason he undertakes to bar the doors of opportunity against him.

Colonialism, imperialism, exploitation, monopolistic practices of one kind and another—these and a score of other sources of international tension are directly traceable to the secularism which pervades so much of modern life.

Today juvenile authorities throughout the nation are very rightly alarmed over the influence of the horror and sex comics on the life of our youth. The use of narcotics has become a national scandal, and sex-saturated entertainment is known to be a contributing factor in the increasing problem of juvenile crime. It is not necessary to conduct any complex and highly publicized survey in the matter; even the least observant among us is able to see that the element of profit is conspicuously present in all such situations.

That some remedy for this vast association of evils is to be found in legislation is to be admitted. The restraints of law must be invoked. But no law can be made effective which is not supported by public opinion. This makes the problem of secularism intensely personal.

The Christian remedy is the doctrine of stewardship! When a majority of our people accept the doctrine that all things come from God, and that each man is a divinely appointed steward assigned to administer whatever goods may happen to be under his authority, we will have begun to solve the problem of secularism. It is definitely and distinctly a spiritual issue; so the responsibility for presenting it lies with the church.

Two conflicting and mutually antagonistic philosophies of possessions have come down to us from out the ancient world—the Hebrew and the Roman.

It was the basic philosophy of the Roman Empire that each man was the owner of all the things that he possessed. Within the limits of the laws laid down by the state for the protection of the public from abuses, and the guarantee to the state of public revenue, the individual was the undisputed owner of all those goods he was able to control.

The Hebrew philosophy, on the other hand, was something entirely different. Day after day in the temple the Hebrew sang his confession that "the earth is the Lord's," and that "all things come of thee, O Lord." Fundamental in this concept was the belief that God was the Creator of everything and that man was his steward. This doctrine was placed at the masthead of the Old Testament, in the words, "In the begining God created the heavens and the earth." A little later it is said that God gave man "dominion"

The Faithfulness of God

J. M. BLOUGH

God has made us; his we are;
Also heaven's farthest star;
None from him can drift afar:
God is faithful, God is true.

Seasons come and seasons go;
Rains descend and harvests grow;
Bins are made to overflow:
God is faithful, God is true.

He has promised all things good—
Peace and plenty, rest and food;
Trust him fully as we should:
God is faithful, God is true.

Has disaster crossed your way?
Then remember, when you pray,
Troubles have not long to stay:
God is faithful, God is true.

When our work on earth is done,
And we face the setting sun,
Then rejoice, the vict'ry's won:
God is faithful, God is true.

Grow not weary, just believe;
Never shall our God deceive;
Great reward we shall receive:
God is faithful, God is true.

but nowhere is it intimated that he gave him a deed to the earth.

As a direct and immediate result of this doctrine of stewardship the Hebrew people developed through the years a vast body of laws aimed at the protection of the rights of individuals, the administration of property and the assurance of justice to classes and persons. To this they gave the name which being translated, means social justice. The great Old Testament prophets arose as the defenders of mishpat. No other people had any such philosophy of possesions. Had not Isaiah, Amos, Jeremiah or Micah believed that the earth was the Lord's and that men and nations were God's stewards they would never have risked their lives in defying sinful governments in defense of mishpat.

As token of the fact that God was the owner of all things and that men were stewards, the law of the tithe was developed. The paying of tithes was common throughout the ancient East, but between the Hebrew tithe and the pagan tithe there was this profound difference. The pagan paid his tithe in the hope that he might thereby purchase the good will of his gods. The Hebrew paid his tithe as an acknowledgment of God's ownership of all things and his stewardship. This had the effect of making the payment of tithes a highly personal and effective expression of faith on the part of the tithe payer. Such it must be in our modern life if it is to accomplish the spiritual purpose for which it was designed, and thus save ourselves from the seductions of secularism.

The problem is not political nor social nor academic. It is essentially this: Am I, as an individual to be the master of my possessions or are my possessions to master me? The question is inescapably personal. Am I going to find a great purpose around which to drape my life, making every interest, effort and ability serve that central design, or am I going to live the divided life, the victim of the ten thousand impulses, desires, passions, whims and forces which play upon me every hour of every day? It is impossible for any person to achieve peace of mind, spiritual serenity or "integration," on the basis of a divided loyalty. Jesus said it was impossible to serve God and Mammon.

The issue which the individual Christian faces is perfectly plain. He must bring his economic interests under the sovereignty of God, or his economic interests will rob him of the best of God. After forty-six years' experience in the ministry and in dealing with the personal religious problems of thousands of people, I know of no other safeguard against the perils of secularism that can compare with tithing. The crucial point is not the tenth but proportional giving. Advocacy of the tithe should not be prompted by any desire to raise more millions of dollars for the churches, although widespread acceptance of the tithing system would have that effect. The central objective is the spiritual redemption of the Christian who has become enmeshed in things and is becoming the helpless victim of a pagan secularism. I have yet to see one convinced tither who has tithed systematically and faithfully for one year who was willing to surrender the plan and go back to his earlier haphazard and unstewardlike practices.

It is impossible for me to write on this theme without offering my personal testimony. There was a time when collections were an embarrassment to me. I was always asking myself the question, "How much must I give to this cause?" I had the feeling that I ought to give, and it was somehow my duty, but I had no system. Then one day I discovered the secret. My reading of the Bible suggested the giving of the tithe. So I decided to give one tenth of my income, not as a mere matter of obeying a law, but as a thankful expression of my faith in Christ. Almost immediately I found my problems solving themselves. That was a big gain in itself.

And then I discovered that when I set aside one tenth of my income, I always had something to give. I have no apologies to offer for my system of giving.

So far as I know, it is our only antidote for secularism!

The Wrapping and the Gift

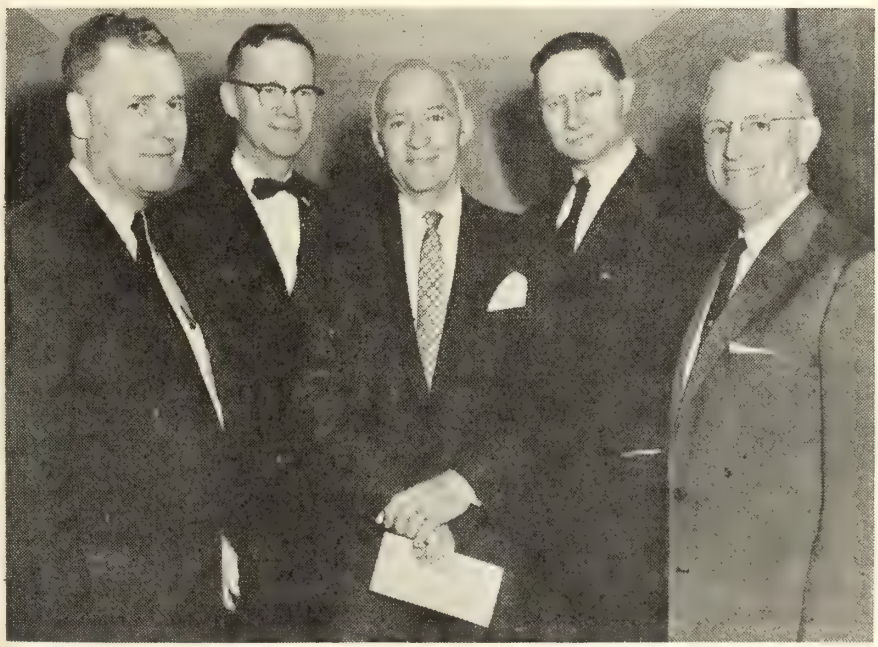
it as an end, what then should be our attitude? We should recognize that the gift determines the wrapping. We do not first decorate our empty boxes and wrappings. But instead we first buy the gift and the gift determines the size and nature of our wrappings. Let us never forget this in our relationship to our Bible. The Bible did not create God, but God working in history through men created the Bible. Concerning the New Testament, the Scriptures did not make up the story of Jesus, but Jesus and his life brought forth the Scriptures. Therefore, the Bible is to be judged and determined by Jesus just as wrappings are determined by the nature of the gift. Every passage must be studied using the yardstick of the interpretation of God given to us in the life of Jesus.

It does little good to keep lecturing to people to read their Bibles. Instead, we must lead them to see the supreme gift. Then they will open the wrapping, the Bible, to receive the gift. Open the wrapping, the Bible, this Christmas season and receive the gift . . . Christ, his way and abundant life.

Brethren Attend Conference on the Churches and Social Welfare

Ralph E. Smeltzer

THE National Conference on the Churches and Social Welfare met in Cleveland November 1-4 in the city's public auditorium after three years' planning. In the same auditorium five years ago the National Council of Churches was constituted.



The National Council of Churches called the conference to be convened by its Department of Social Welfare and its Division of Home Missions. In the call signed by Bishop William C. Martin, then president of the Council, the conference was "to consider the role and function of the churches in relation to the changing needs in social welfare."

Official delegates were appointed by the thirty-one communions identified with the work of the two sponsoring units of the council and by state and local councils. Special recognition was given to five organizations as associates: Y.W.C.A., Y.M.C.A., Salvation Army, Volunteers of America and the American Hospital Association. Others came as accredited visitors and consultants, including representatives of most of the leading welfare agencies in the U.S. that generally co-operate with the churches. Only official delegates had voting privileges.

The Church of the Brethren was represented by the following twenty-nine delegates: Mr. and Mrs. Oscar Anderson, Norman J. Baugher, Desmond W. Bittinger, Elmer Brumbaugh, Dr. and Mrs. Franklin Cassel, C. Ernest Davis, Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Dick, John C. Eller, T. F. Henry, Ora Huston, Bernard N. King, Elizabeth B. Kunz, W. Ray Kyle, Mr. and Mrs. Ira Mikesell, Elizabeth Mow, Cletus Myers, I. C. Paul, Mr. and Mrs. E. O. Reed, James Renz, Ralph E. Smeltzer, Shirley Stafford, Atlee Stroup, Levi K. Ziegler and Charles Zunkel.

Much research went into the preparation for the conference. The result was two new volumes on church social welfare. The first was The Activating Concern, which treats the historical and theological involvement of the churches in the health and welfare field. Included in this volume is a chapter on the Church of the Brethren and social welfare. The second is The Changing Scene covering current trends and issues and providing for the first time a statistical picture of church welfare in the United States.

Conference Highlights

"The Churches Repond to the Nation's Needs." With the theme of the conference emblazoned in tall gold letters above the stage the conference convened for the first plenary session on November 1. Present were delegates and visitors from forty-three states, District of Columbia, Alaska, Puerto Rico and six foreign countries. Switzerland, India, Germany, Japan, Uruguay were represented by one each. Canada sent four persons.

More than 1,500 persons attended including representatives from the following groups which are not members of the National Council of Churches: American Lutheran, Mennonite General Conference, Evangelical Lutheran, Lutheran Church—Missouri Synod, Southern Baptist Convention and Finnish Evangelical Lutheran. One Roman Catholic and three of the Jewish faith attended. The Canadian Council of Churches sent four persons and twenty-two were present from health and welfare organizations.

The conference was planned to afford the widest possible participation by every one present. Plenary sessions were held each morning, and afternoons were devoted to forty group sessions. Open meetings were held two evenings. Delegates also met at luncheon or dinner and at denominational and regional sessions.

As the conference opened in Music Hall the first voice heard was that of the representatives of the sponsoring National Council of Churches. Organized social welfare as we know it today, said the Council's general secretary, Dr. Roy G. Ross, is a relatively new concept and this is especially true of welfare as a function of the state. "It is in a sense the product of the highly organized society in which we of the 20th century live."

He expressed the hope that from the four-day conference the churches "may gain deeper insights to spur their social welfare tasks" but above all "new insights on ways in which they may work together in giving maximum service in social welfare."

The keynote speech was delivered by Dr. Leonard Mayo of New York, chairman of the conference and director of the Association for the Aid of Crippled Children.

He urged the churches to defend free speech and the right to the unpopular view, whether religious or secular, as vital to the survival not only of freedom of worship but of the free enterprise system. He called upon them to make known in articulate, forceful ways their abhorrence of injustice no matter where, by whom or upon whom it is perpetrated. In matters of human freedom he said this issue overshadows all those calling for specific social action by the church.

This was one plank in a three-point program put forth by Dr. Mayo to involve the churches more extensively in broad social issues and specific social action. Others called upon church leaders, national and local, to (1) speak out with courage and clarity on current social issues that go to the heart of their religious convictions and to the roots of human needs; (2) to become acquainted with welfare programs, take an active part in policy making, in discussions of current issues and in interpreting social welfare needs to the community, and in activating church members to emulate them.

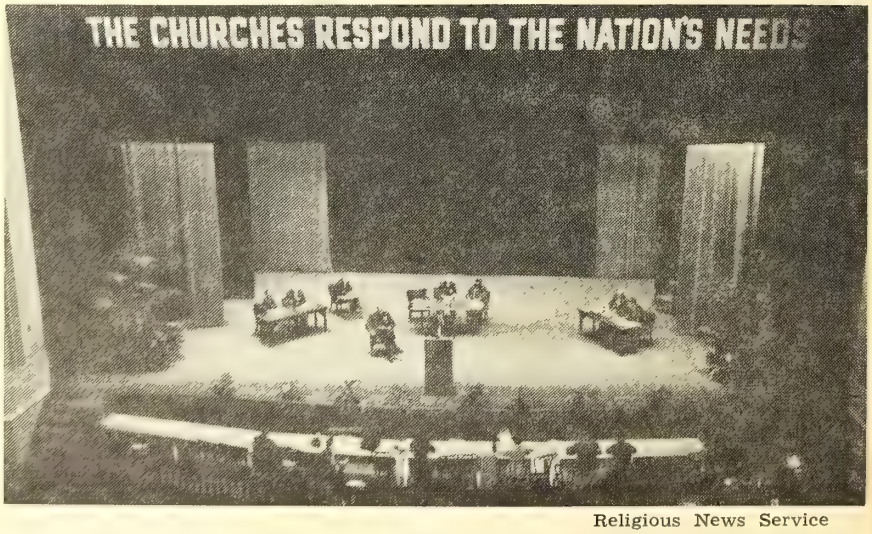
Two leading addresses were given at the open session Tuesday evening, one by Bradshaw Mintener, assistant secretary of Health, Education and Welfare of the United States, and the other by Dr. Eugene Carson Blake, president of the National Council of Churches and stated clerk of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A.

The Methodist layman challenged the churches to assure that government, business and individual citizens never fail the distressed, dependent or disadvantaged in our society. This, he said, was the unique task of the church. He called on the church "to refresh and inspire the social conscience of the nation."

Dr. Blake, after dealing extensively with the contrast between the "secret conspiracy" of communism and the "open conspiracy" of Christianity and the differences between their two "revolutions," concluded with these words:

"Cynical men have lumped us together under the derisive title of 'do-gooders.' I suggest we accept the title and let it be known to all our critics that it is our resolution to do good to all men, especially to the weak and ignorant, the evil and the lost. Surely we are do-gooders. But we are not the purveyers of inadequate palliatives to a society that always remains less than truly just.

"We are engaged in an open conspiracy to make a better world according to the pattern revealed by God through our Lord Jesus Christ. Nearly 2,000 years of history are behind us and on that we build, looking forward ever to the city which has foundations, whose builder and maker is God."



In his address on Nov. 2, Dr. Roswell P. Barnes, associate general secretary of the National Council of Churches, said that religion has a significant and essential role to play in American social welfare activities. He declared that "religion can do for social welfare what psychosomatic medicine is doing for the approach to an individual's health."

Only theology, Dr. Barnes observed, has the comprehensive approach needed to develop a sound philosophy and program of social welfare which takes into account the individual's environment and inner tensions, economics and inhibitions, intergroup conflicts and personal sin. "Think of what this means," he continued, "in dealing with problems such as juvenile delinquency, alcoholism, narcotic addiction and housing. The evangelist, the pastoral counselor, the surgeon, the psychiatrist and the recreation director are all essential to the team that deals with the individual and the massive social problem, the whole man in his whole social setting."

An original dramatic presentation, written especially for the conference and entitled ". . . And He Stretched Forth his Hand . . ." was then staged by a cast of twenty-nine Clevelanders without a dress rehearsal. It told the simple and moving story of a community learning, step by step, to meet the human needs of its children, teen-agers and grownups through an awakened church ministry. Those who packed the Music Hall to see it, afterward filled out cards registering their reactions. None said they did not like it.

Opportunity for fellowship was provided Wednesday afternoon and evening. At noon the delegates attended seven regional luncheons, and in the evening denominational dinners were held. These were for Baptists, Church of the Brethren, Disciples of Christ, Evangelical and Reformed, Lutheran, Methodist, Presbyterian USA and Protestant Episcopal. Congregational Christians joined with the E. and R. group.

Dr. Ira De A. Reid, professor of sociology, Haverford College, Pa., charged at the Thursday morning session that American Protestantism has become a "middle-class church" and that it has been more concerned "with those of us who are relatively safe and secure than with suffering and submerged humanity."

The Family Counselor

Naomi Will H. K. Zeller, Jr. Jesse Ziegler

The Family Counselor welcomes letters of inquiry. They may be addressed: Family Life Department, General Brotherhood Board, 22 S. State St., Elgin, Ill.

Dear Counselor,

What is a wife's duty when she knows her husband is taking money that does not belong to him? For many years I've lived with his lies, his cheating, and sneaking around to read licentious books, but I don't think I'll ever get used to it. Our friends and families would be deeply shocked if they knew. I don't know how much longer I can pretend.

We have children to consider in any decision I might make. Is it at all possible that these tendencies will be inherited by them?

Will anxiously await your answer.

Anxious Wife.

Dear Friend,

My heart really goes out to you in your distress.

As to the question of your duty in connection with your knowledge of your husband's dishonesty, from the legal standpoint a wife is not compelled to testify against her husband. Legally you may claim exemption from reporting him to the authorities, but from the moral and spiritual viewpoint, it is your duty to do something about it.

I would suggest that you find a Christian minister in whose judgment you have confidence and talk the whole matter over with him. He should be able to advise you as to your next course of action or he may be able to counsel with your husband in such a way as to get him to work out the problem with the person or persons he has wronged.

It will be damaging to your spiritual life for you to continue to keep silent about this and will only make matters worse for your husband to continue to succeed in this wrong course. His impure thinking, his evil living, his dishonest actions will catch up with him eventually. The sooner he can be made to face up to the futility of his ways, the sooner he may change and the lives of all of you be made bearable once more.

Evil causes pain in those wronged and in the heart of God, but there is the possibility of penitence, of restitution, of forgiveness and abundant living if one follows the way of Christ according to his conscience.

In reply to your question on inherited tendencies, I am quoting a statement from the book by English and Foster, Fathers are Parents Too. ". . . today we know that no such defeatist point of view is scientifically sound. No baby is born 'bad.' He does not inherit a tendency toward evil. He becomes unkind or cantankerous or suspicious or deceitful because of what happens to him, literally, from his birth."

If in the circumstances in which you find yourself, you can give your children enough love and understanding, if you can give them in yourself an example of respect for integrity and a living illustration of the holding power of faith in God, your children can come through, fortified to meet life nobly.

Share your concerns daily with God in prayer and trust in him.

Naomi Will.

The Haverford professor asserted that "on the whole, Protestant churches have followed the migrations of the middle class and to a large extent the migrations of the middle-class mind." We have become a nation of "city slickers," he said. As men have moved to the cities, so have their churches.

This might be good business, he declared. It might be good religion and it is certainly a good example of pastoral services, but it has contributed to the Protestant church's identification with the middle classes.

At the same session, a panel discussed The Church As a Social Conscience.

The Rev. James H. Robinson, pastor of Harlem's Church of the Master (Presbyterian) in New York, said the church must recover its heritage of social influence and again become the social conscience of the nation. He defined this as the church's urgent task in the modern world "where cities grow too large for their own good, where politicians have more influence and power than ministers, where labor unions and other organizations have fostered social legislation and developed low-cost housing, welfare funds, health clinics, recreation, health and rest resorts."

Joseph P. Anderson, New York, executive secretary of the National Association of Social Workers, charged that in an era of unprecedented national prosperity a total of 11,000,000 Americans are not earning enough money to meet the cost of such basic essentials as rent, food, ultilities and clothing. These are the aged, the orphaned, the blind, the sick and the unemployed who need our help, he said. Yet many of the representatives in Congress still legislate for these people "as though they lived and worked in the last century," he said.

Miss Thelma Stevens, New York, executive secretary of the Department of Social Relations, Women's Division of Christian Service, Board of Missions of the Methodist Church, said that the church is today faced with the danger of conforming to society rather than leading the struggle for social change. "In many instances," she said, "the church has reflected the secular pattern of society to such an extent that it has become the focus of 'witch hunt' tactics and name calling."

An address on The City Church and Human Need was given by the Rev. Dr. David W. Barry, executive director of New York City Mission Society, at a dinner for city workers. Dr. Barry issued a plea for American Protestantism to pour money, organization and leadership into the gigantic task of "winning the American city for Christ." The American city, he said, "is at a major turning point in its social and religious history. It can be won for Jesus Christ or it can be lost." He said he had "a feeling at times approaching desperation that the Protestant churches have lost contact with the movement of history and are losing the best chance they have had in a century to win the American city." He scored Protestantism for neglect of the city and its problems. "We seem content," he said, "to ignore completely the changes wrought by time on the city's social fabric and to drift along with a strategy of churchmanship that is splendidly irrelevant to the human situation in today's urban community."

At Thursday's open evening meeting, Dr. Martha Eliot, chief of the Children's Bureau, Department of Health, Education and Welfare, presented a frightening panorama of the nation's children, many of them crippled intellectually and Leaders of religious overseas relief agencies met with Secretary of Agriculture Ezra Benson and urged him to release grains from surplus government stocks for use in their programs of free food distribution to hungry people abroad. Until now the agencies have been able to obtain only dairy products and cottonseed oil from surplus stocks although these have been in lesser supply than food grains, especially wheat. The delegation pointed out to Mr. Benson that their programs are threatened by projected cuts next year in the amount of surplus dried milk, butter and cheese to be made available. Cottonseed oil may cease to be available at all, they said.

Statistics of giving issued annually by the Joint Department of Stewardship and Benevolence of the National Council of Churches are now available from the Stewardship and Brotherhood Fund department at Elgin. One copy is available without charge to any pastor, finance chairman or treasurer.

Kathleen Sink, daughter of Brother and Sister Clarence Sink of Waterloo, Iowa, who was taken to the Iowa City University hospital on Oct. 13 with bulbar polio, was returned home on Nov. 17. She is progressing nicely and will be back in school soon. Kathleen and her family are grateful to all who remembered her in prayer and by card and want you to accept this as your personal thanks for your kindness.

James Buffenmyer, bass-baritone, and Alvin Brightbill, organ, have recorded the hymns of William Beery which are in the 1951 Brethren Hymnal. The record also includes When I Survey the Wondrous Cross, which was sung at the Grand Rapids Conference. The record, an unbreakable 33 1/3 rpm long playing one, is now ready for delivery and orders, accompanied by $3.00 for each record, should be sent to the York Center Church of the Brethren, Lombard 1, Ill. McPherson College

Seven McPherson College seniors have been selected for Who's Who among Students in American Universities and Colleges. The seven include Leland Lengle from Colorado, Norman Long from Minnesota, Eula Mae Murrey from Kansas, Max Parmley from Kansas, Donald Lee Ullom from Colorado, Mary Elizabeth Swinger from Missouri, and Bob Wise from Iowa.

McPherson College and the community of McPherson were honored recently when Eui Joon Kim, one of the two Korean delegates to the United Nations, visited the campus en route to New York to attend the UN Assembly meetings. Mr. Kim, father-in-law of Guan Jo, a McPherson College junior from Korea, was guest at a noon luncheon given by the college and community in his honor. Through an interpreter, delegate Kim, who speaks little English, spoke briefly during the luncheon. His daughter Chang, is also an exchange student from Korea to America.

D. W. Bittinger was in Cleveland, Ohio, Nov. 1-3,

as one of the twelve representatives of the Church of the Brethren who attended the international conference for churchmen and sociologists. The conference was concerned with how the church offers leadership to help solve the social needs of the world.

Some twenty McPherson College students attended the Brethren Student Christian Movement conference at Bridgewater College during the Thanksgiving vacation. Bro. Bittinger and Richard Wareham, religious life director, accompanied the group.

McPherson College and the college church were hosts to the Western Regional Conference, Nov. 12-17. The college contributed to the conference program when the Players Club presented the three-act play, Noah, by Andre Obey. The a cappella choir, the chapel choir, the two college church choirs and the college-civic orchestra combined to present a Sunday afternoon vesper musicale. College students were especially addressed in two chapel services by two of the conference leaders, Dr. Edwin Dahlberg, pastor of the Delmar Baptist church in St. Louis, and A. Stauffer Curry, editor of the Brethren Sunday-school publications. Other conference leaders were members of the Elgin staff and some pastors of the region. Glenn Swinger, director of public relations, was the conference director.

College deputation groups are scheduled to make twenty-five appearances in churches throughout the region during the school year. In addition to the ladies' trio, which toured Colorado churches in October, the male quartet, the ladies' trio, the string quartet, the chapel choir and the a cappella choir will go on week-long tours. Deputation groups will also include students who formerly served in the B.V.S. and Alternative Service programs.

A large number of alumni, former students and friends were on campus for the 1955 home-coming. Of special interest were the coffee hour for '54 and '55 alumni teachers, the alumni tea and the after-game coffee hour for alumni and students. A victory by the Bulldog football team added great interest also. Fahnestock Hall boys placed first in the campus decoration judging. Miss Anita McSpadden, of Lamar, Colo., was the home-coming queen. Her attendants were Miss Patsy Miller of Rocky Ford, Colo., and Miss Rhonda Rossow of McPherson, Kansas.

The regional youth cabinet met at the college Nov. 11-13. The cabinet includes a youth representative and an adult counselor from each district in the region. In addition, it includes seven members of the executive committee who are all college students. Twenty-five voting members, representing all fifteen districts in the region, were present at this first meeting of the newly enlarged regional cabinet. The group felt great strides were made in respect to present and, especially, future youth work.

Rocky Mountain trail hikes offered a great spiritual experience for twenty-eight older youth in the Western Region last August. During the regional conference in November many of the hikers met again. They added flavor to the occasion by eating dehydrated food and sharing the majestic beauty of the mountains as captured by colored slides. Several McPherson College students were in the hikers' group.

There is a very definite flavoring of international relationships on the campus this year. In addition to the students from Germany, Greece, Korea, Puerto Rico and Holland, there are students who have returned after spending some time abroad as Brethren Service workers or exchange students. One of the students, Jan Van Asselt, whose home is in the Netherlands, came to the college as the husband of Peggy Sargent, a 1953 graduate and a B.V.S. worker in Europe for two years. Returning to the campus after six months in Belgium through the 4-H exchange program is Eula Mae Murrey of Conway, Kansas. Miss Murrey arrived on the campus during the latter part of November and will graduate at the end of the school term.

McPherson College participated in several governor's conferences. One conference was called at Topeka to help prepare for the White House Conference on Education. Another was called, also at Topeka, to study the role which the various educational, professional and industrial organizations in the state of Kansas can play to improve and strengthen international relations. Still another governor's conference was called at Hutchinson for the purpose of studying world affairs. Various instructors, students, and classes have profited from participation in these conferences.

1955 European Annual Conference

Owen H. Jander

THERE is no event in the Brethren year quite like the European annual conference. Contrasted with Annual Conferences in America, this get-together over here is a small affair, indeed; what it lacks in magnitude, however, it makes up in intensity. It would be totally impossible to pack into seven short days a greater measure of inspired devotional activity and fellowship almost bursting with spontaneity and enthusiasm.

On the 29th of August there assembled in Kassel some fifty Brethren volunteers and their directors from six European countries—Germany, Austria, Greece, Turkey, Switzerland and England. For seven days these young workers, all of whom are devoting at least two years to the European program of the Church of the Brethren, shared their experiences with one another, worshiped together, planned together and enjoyed one another's company with all of the abandon of close friends who come together after long periods of adventure-filled absence. In essence, of course, this is much the same as the sort of Annual Conference which our faithful brothers at home enjoy. But the familylike intimacy which pervades this group—an intimacy which is a projection of the unit-training days at New Windsor, Md.—is something quite distinctive in Brethren Service.

Conference reports have a way of being routine and boring, but not at the European annual conference, where it is with the most intense personal interest that we hear news of the experiences, the disappointments, the accomplishments and the victories which each of us has had in his own work. Every participant is the program was given opportunity to report about his activities and impressions during the year. More extensive reports were given by the administrators of the work within the separate countries.

The great success of the 1955 European annual conference was due in no small part to outstanding Brethren leaders who were in attendance at the occasion. In addition to directing the Bible study for the week, William Beahm, dean of Bethany Seminary, addressed the group on several occasions and was one of the principal speakers at the Schwarzenau Day ceremonies with which the week culminated. Bro. Beahm's friendly humor endeared him to the volunteers at the conference; his challenging messages found them alert and receptive.

The conference attenders were especially privileged to be addressed by John Metzler, executive secretary of the European surplus commodities program of the World Council of Churches. Mr. Metzler's address, entitled Life and Works, stressed the inadequacy of mere giving which is not supported by spiritual offerings. In a spirit of deepest self-examination, the volunteers brought this idea up again and again during the week.

It was most fortunate that the European annual conference this year coincided with the German segment of the present world tour of W. Harold Row, the executive secretary of the Brethren Service Commission. It was possible, therefore, for him to be present throughout the entire week. With exceptional vision and intuition, Bro. Row described the principles which will guide Brethren Service through the years to come. Perhaps the most striking was his expression of the universal desire of the Brethren to establish inroads into Communist areas, to attack world tensions where they are most problematical.

This desire to reach behind the Iron Curtain was also expressed by M. R. Zigler, European director of Brethren Service, who was on hand to pour forth his words of inspiration and to radiate his exemplary spirit of frankness and friendliness. It was especially fitting that he should be the leader at the love feast ceremony which climaxed the week of reunion. The ceremony was carried on with exceptional dignity and beauty and left all participants filled with a spirit of rededication to the important work being done here in Europe. As is invariably the case when Brethren assemble, the singing reflected the deep enthusiasm of those in attendance. The whole-hearted participation in the singing of hymns, the rousing and spontaneous fellowship singing, the beauty and precision of the prepared choral pieces—all added tremendously to the spirit of the occasion.

A sense of the wider fellowship of the church was brought to evidence most impressively by the numerous letters which came to Kassel during the week, bringing greetings from friends both here in Europe and in America.

The 1955 annual conference was the tenth annual meeting of its kind in Europe. One sensed, from the many things said, an awareness that Brethren Service now has a history of accomplishment in this part of the world. In reviewing the past ten years, there seemed to be a general feeling that the program was succeeding in adapting itself to the changes which have taken place in postwar Europe during that period. In discussing the future of the work over here, speakers mentioned repeatedly the ambition to pierce the Iron Curtain at the first opportunity.

Once again the attention of every participant in the Eupropean program was drawn to the tremendous advantages of the splendid physical plant which we have here at Kassel. It was possible during the week to accommodate without undue crowding no less that seventy-five persons at the Brethren House, which fulfills so admirably the function of a conference center. The smoothness of the conference operations would have been impossible without the benefits of careful planning and pre-organization. The conscientious attention to detail which was displayed by Wilbur Mullen and his planning committee resulted in a week of tight programming which which was carried out without a hitch.

News Notes From Germany

"This family touched my heart," writes Esther Mohler, BVS'er in Germany representing the student exchange program, as she describes a visit she made with an exchangee's family. "The father was killed by the Russians in the war, and two of the four children died in the flight to the West from the East. One son, an alert boy with a winning personality, is now spending an exchange year with a Brethren family. The other son, a gifted youth interested in philosophy and literature, likes to work with people, to talk to them and help keep them from accepting communism. He wants very much to be able to get an education, and I feel that the world will be cheated if he is not allowed to study. But the mother, the family breadwinner, is a frail woman who was rather well-situated in the homeland and did not need to work hard. Now, in addition to losing all her possessions, she has lost her health doing hard physical labor in a factory trying to provide for the family.

"Anyone who knows the tremendous love and longing a German has for homeland and the great contrast between a refugee's life before and after, will understand the significance of her statement: 'Even if it were true that a war would return me to my homeland and my possessions there, I would still choose to spend my entire life doing hard work in a factory, rather than have war. Anything rather than war! Even occupation by another country, but not WAR!' "

W. Harold Row extends greetings from the Church of the Brethren in the United States to the people of Schwarzenau on Sept. 4, 1955, at the presentation of 60,000 Deutsche Marks to the community of Schwarzenau

"We saw Germany" exclaimed Ken Kreider, BVS'er working with Heifer Project recipient family visitation, when he returned with Max Snider, assistant Heifer Project representative, from his first trip. He expounds further, "We talked to families who have left all and come with practically nothing to a new home. Some of them have since rented three or four cows but if, for some reason, as was the case for one family we visited, they must move elsewhere, the only agricultural possession they can take with them is the American cow.

"Some of the people just could not hold back the tears when telling about their homeland and their flight from it. Others could not express themselves when trying to tell us to give a special thanks to those people in the United States who did not even know them and yet gave them a real live cow.

"I had often heard about the hardships of refugees and was expecting to see something unpleasant, but I was unprepared for what I saw. I think that it is a terrible pity that anybody must live that way, let alone so many.

"We came back to Kassel over the turnpike and it was a beautiful drive. Just like hundreds of tourists we said, 'Isn't Germany beautiful!' But we had seen what the tourists do not see. We knew that behind those picturesque hills there were misery and suffering that people must see to believe. We saw Germany!"

Returning German prisoners of war without friends and relatives were offered the hospitality of Brethren House, Kassel. Wilbur Mullen, director of Brethren Service in Germany, in a meeting with Pastor Bopp, federal director of the German Y.M.C.A., extended the House accommodations to those who would most need it. Emergency needs arise daily and one only needs keep his eyes open to see them. This need gives opportunity to help the heartbroken who are returning after ten years behind Russian camp walls to search for a family which no longer exists.

A Technique in Program Planning

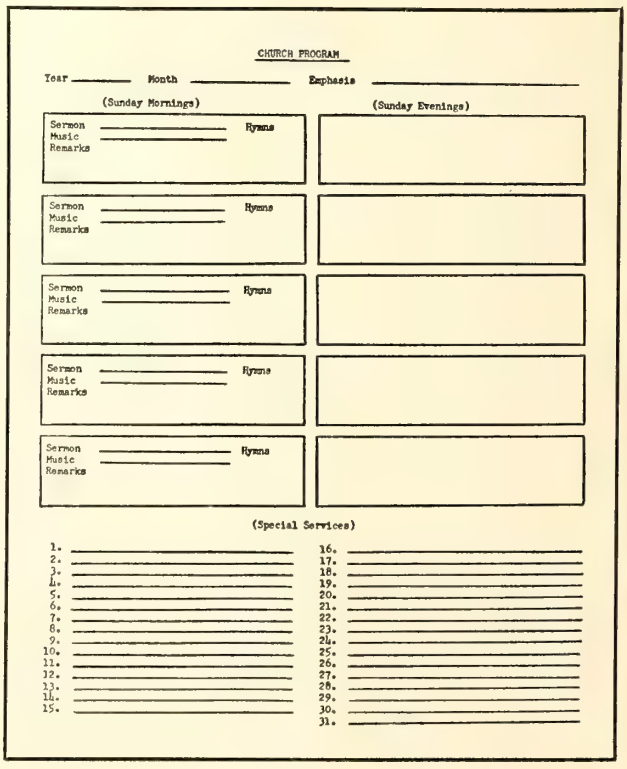
E. G. Carper

A NEGRO preacher called on a minister friend of his one day and found the man busy writing. "What you-all doin'?" he asked. "I'm preparing notes for my sermon for next Sunday." The first gentleman shook his head. "I certainly would never do dat, sir. De debbil am a-lookin' right over your shoulder and knows everything you gwine to say, an' he am prepared for you. Now, I don't make no notes and when I gets up to talk, neder me nor the debbil hisself know what I'm goin' to say."

Chuckle all you wish, pastor friends and church workers. The irony of the story is that there are too many church committees that exist only on paper. Some pastors and teachers do not know what is going to come from their pulpits or classrooms on next Sunday morning! It has been said that Beecher and Spurgeon busied themselves all week with other things and on Saturday night prepared their morning messages. Perhaps Beecher and Spurgeon could do that, but few of us are or ever will be a Beecher or a Spurgeon.

I once knew a preacher who, in his earlier ministry, never printed his sermon topics in his church bulletin; he waited until late Saturday night after the groceries were bought and the shopping completed to choose a subject to preach on for the following morning. His argument was "they were fresh." Then one Saturday night he got company. The result: the development of the program described in this article.

A homoletics professor repeatedly told his class to read, read, read and read some more; prepare sermon plots and outlines, write down and save living illustrations, for you'll need them. How right he was! Experience has taught me that any living message is a product of some hard thinking, reading and living with an idea over a long period of time.



It is not the intent of this article to tell you how or to help plan your church program. Nobody can detail your local church program from his swivel chair in another place. People's needs and problems vary from place to place, therefore, each pastor with the aid of his people and committees must plan a program that will minister to the needs of his congregation. It is wise, however, in planning church programs for ministers to follow the following basic principles.

Essential to Planning

1. Don't change church programs too rapidly. A quick jerk on an automobile wheel to pull it out of a rut will usually send it into the ditch and, even though carefully repaired, it will never be quite the same. A veteran pastor and seminary president once gave me some good advice as I was about to begin a new charge. Seated in a chair across from me in his office, he looked at me and said, "Many a good minister has lost the goodwill of his people by leading them too fast. In the domestic and industrial world people better themselves in any way possible by adopting better customs and inventions, but [and here he paused] in religion these same people object to change. Spend your first year in any parish gaining the love and goodwill of your people." This is still good advice.

On the other hand, it is not wise for one person or a clique in the church to dictate or hold up your program because "we never did it that way before." A minister and his people must work together to serve men and God effectively.

2. Follow your denominational as well as the ecumenical church dates. It is nice to know that on a particular date Christians in other parts of the world are observing the same

A planning sheet for outlining all church programs and activities is a great aid to the minister and the church committees theme or emphasis—it gives a feeling of belonging to something larger than one small individual church. From the denominational headquarters we are afforded the opportunity of receiving many helpful ideas and materials that are available from the various church agencies. We strengthen our own Brotherhood when the local churches unitedly support the programs outlined by the Church of the Brethren Annual Conference.

3. Use variety. I am of the opinion that the Sunday morning worship service should remain as it is—the pastor leading his congregation in the proclamation of the gospel truth. I am also aware that there are many other avenues of expressing the gospel of salvation and many of them are far more effectual than a pastor's second Sunday sermon. There are (with some exceptions) relatively few pastors who can attract a large Sunday evening crowd by his preaching. The records prove it. Yet there are still a few churches and pastors who insist on the traditional evangelistic sermon on Sunday evenings. A peek inside one of these churches will usually reveal a small group of the loyal supporters of the church. Church members should have the opportunity of planning and participating in the Sunday evening services. Discover and use talent of all ages in giving Christian plays, pantomimes, pageants, panel discussions, forums, debates, devotional talks, films and music programs. You will find that the church attendance will shortly double itself. The secret is found through participation.

4. There must be a broad skeleton program. Plan the year's program with the help of church committees, well in advance of the church year. Details come later. The wise pastor preaches according to a planned program. It is with the technique of this over-all program planning that I have a concern.

Mechanics of Plan

In planning church programs I have been constantly harried by the lack of a workable plan whereby the total program of the church could be viewed at one quick glance. After some serious thinking and experimenting I have developed a plan whereby every service or meeting of the church can be recorded and seen in a moment's time. This does away with the endless paging through a date book to see if this or that date is filled.

In this plan two items are necessary and both are inexpensive. First, twelve 8½ x 11 inch monthly program sheets (see illustration) are needed for planning your year's program. You can make your own. On each sheet is ample space to record the sermon titles, hymns, special music and comments for each Sunday morning and evening service as well as space to write in any additional services, committee meeting, class parties, fellowship suppers or other meetings for every day during the month.

Then provide the church with a bulletin board, approximately four feet by three feet. You can buy one manufactured commercially, or construct one your self.

Starting from the top left-hand side, thumbtack four rows of three planning sheets each allowing a little space between sheets and on borders. Tack each sheet separately to facilitate removing if necessary. It is now a simple matter to fill in your church calendar, and be able to see at a quick glance what has been planned for any month, week or day of the entire church year.

TWELVE DEFINITIONS OF A TOKEN GIFT

More Than 90% of our Church Families Are Making Only Token Gifts to Their Churches

1. A token gift is one which represents less than $1 per week for every $1,000 of annual income of the giving family—this is less than one-half the tithe.

2. A token gift is not made "token" by just the size of the gift but by comparison to the financial ability of the giver to give—by the need of the giver to give.

3. A token gift is not just one that is small in amount. It is even more likely that the family with the greater giving ability is making a token gift in an amount that may seem large when compared to some real gifts.

4. A token gift is not a gift because "to give" is defined as "to bestow freely without return." Therefore, a contribution to a church which is only large enough to cover the giver's proportionate share of the church expenses (for services received and facilities used) is not a gift but only a payment—like dues to a club.

5. A token gift is like a zero. It can be increased by a percentage, or even multiplied a number of times and it will continue to be only a token gift.

6. A token gift is obviously an excuse for not making a real gift and it robs the giver of the positive acceptance of Christian responsibility and the pleasures that go with real giving. People enjoy doing those things which they do well.

7. A token gift is not strong enough to pull more than equally token interests—in the giver's own spiritual life. Christ said "where your treasure is, there your heart will be also." He put treasure first, with the degree of interest dependent upon the proportion of the treasure as explained in the parable about the widow's mite.

8. A token gift cannot be considered as a positive spiritual action, therefore it must carry with it either a neutral or a negative spiritual reaction. When confronted with a requirement for action, a token giver cannot be expected to take a positive action.

9. A token gift is worse than no gift because:

a. It tempts others to make token gifts to the church.

b. It helps the church enough (only financially) to conceal the requirement for better than token gifts from others.

c. It soothes the conscience of the giver.

d. It avoids, or at least postpones, the day of decision for true Christian action.

10. A token gift is a sin because the family which is not giving as much as it needs to give to its church obviously is worshiping its dollars more than it is worshiping the Lord, and therefore is breaking the first and the most important of the Ten Commandments.

11. A token gift is a form of spiritual suicide which can involve the innocent giver who is not properly led and guided in spiritual dollar giving by the responsible leaders of the church.

12. A token gift is indicative of a bad habit of giving. People must be taught how to overcome bad habits.

Ecuador Mission in Review

THE Brethren in India, Nigeria and Ecuador prepare periodic reports for the Foreign Mission Commission. Here is the one submitted by Ecuador for the November meeting of the commission.

Agriculture

There has been a growing interest in the vaccination of livestock. Twenty-one families brought 260 chickens to the farm for vaccination. Fifteen pigs were vaccinated against pneumonia, twenty-one against cholera—a slight increase over last year.

One hundred eighty New Hampshire three-month old chicks were distributed to 4-F Club boys (a club similar to the 4-H sponsored by the church) as personal projects. The blight resistant four-month potatoes produced well. Seed was sold to nine people in the community for a trial.

One Indian farmer is experimenting in the use of commercial fertilizer by planting an acre of corn on fertilized land.

Corn on the mission farm has been planted in wider rows, thus destroying less roots in cultivation. A green cover crop was planted between corn rows when the corn was at roasting-ear age and turned under when corn was harvested. By this system Indians can improve land and harvest a crop at the same time and we are trying to interest our neighbors in this method.

Medical Work

This year, in the absence of our mission nurse, Faye Koontz, who is on furlough and in language school, the medical work has suffered. Instead of the former 250 treatments, approximately 150 are given each month by other missionaries under the guidance and counsel of Dr. Ovalle, prominent local doctor in Quito. The recent opening of a new forty-bed mission hospital ten miles away under auspices of Radio Station HCJB gives promise of making more complete the medical service in our area.

Education

In spite of intense religious opposition during this year, the Brethren school has continued to grow, having a present enrollment of eighty children. All but seven of these are Indians. The school is complete with six grades. Two Indian graduates are attending the government normal school where, with the help of mission scholarships, they are preparing to become teachers.

The direction of the educational program is completely in the hands of the Ecuadorian Christian school administrator and his wife. This includes administering the educational budget, government liaison work, recommendation and supervision of teachers and public relations of the school in the community. The school continues to receive highest honors among rural schools of the country from state education officials. It also has received encouragement and aid from U. S. Point IV Club, initiation of handweaving and the supplying of powdered milk for our school lunch program.

The Church

This year has seen the formal organization of the local church with the election of two lay elders, two deaconesses and a pastor. One of the two lay elders, a national brother, is moderator of the congregation. The present active membership numbers thirty-six, including Indian and non-Indian brethren. There have been fifteen baptisms during the past year. The group continues to use the mission school chapel for Sunday services, but a local church fund is growing for the purchase of land and construction of the national church independent of the mission.

The church is a member of the young Association of Evangelical Churches in Ecuador and sent delegates to the constitutional convention of this national movement held in Guayaquil late in October.

SEEING NIGERIA With Dorris Blough

Garkida

GARKIDA is just one of our many mission stations on the Africa field and since the other articles will center around this station, I want you to be able to picture in your mind what it is like.

As I mentioned before, this is the oldest station of the Church of the Brethren. The name came from a mountain near the original site first settled. However, now the name is applied to a much larger area.

If you could view it from the air, you would see a road running through the middle. This road enters Garkida from the south and goes through it and out northeast, although the road out is passable only in dry season. As you look down from the air, you can see the market place at the north end of Garkida. There little shelters are built of woven grass mats, each a booth for a trader.

About a quarter of a mile from the market, sitting beside this main road, is the post office. It is a building about ten by twelve feet with the English words POST OFFICE printed on a sign outside. Beyond the post office are the roofs of the school buildings to the left of the road, some with grass roofs, some with metal roofs.

To the far left of the road, beyond the school buildings, we can see the roofs of some houses, homes of missionaries. Each house is built on a hill of its own. First, farthest north is the duplex which houses the Charles Bieber family in one side and Miss Velma Ober in the other. On the next hill is the house in which the Charles Lunkley family lives. Up quite a steep hill is the house of the Herbert Michaels. On top of the next and highest hill you can see the Elmer Baldwin house. Near the Lunkley house is the scaffolding on which is swung the bell, about which I will tell more later. Near by also are the roofs of other buildings, the mission office, the mission store and storage building, and shop buildings.

To the right of the road is the present church building, a T-shaped structure with a grass roof. Beyond the church on the right are the roofs of Africans' houses, anywhere from three to ten within an enclosure, called a compound.

Farther up the road to the left are the motor shop buildings and the one housing the electrical plant. A road leads off to the left toward the houses on the hills and one goes off to the right ending in a group of trees by the river—the mission orchard.

About a half-mile to the right of "main street" we see the River Hawal winding its way. And here and there scattered about the countryside on all sides we see compounds, some of them with their shiny new grass roofs and new fences around them.

Looking down on the main road again we see a new large building being built in a large open field to the left. It is the new church; it will soon have a shiny roof—if enough money can be raised to buy it. A large number of houses cluster together under many trees to the right of the road. Here is our home, Nurse Mary Dadisman's house and the hospital buildings.

Anybody reading books these days?

Other EUNICE MORAGOS

The following story has been shared from Indian Highways, published by Cook Christian Training School, Phoenix, Arizona, through the kindness of its editor, Rev. George Walker, who is also superintendent of the school.—Charles E. Zunkel.

Eunice Morago, who as a girl went out riding at the head of a group of Indian warriors, bent on avenging the killing of her grandfather

THERE'S character in that face—let me get her picture." So spoke Dr. Fred Thorne of the Board of National Missions some years ago when he took this picture of Eunice Morago, Pima Indian church member at Sacaton, Ariz. He and Dr. Limouze were even more interested when they learned her story.

At about sixteen the Apaches had killed her much loved grandfather. She was not a Christian then and she swore vengeance. Like a Joan of Arc, as Dr. Limouze called her, she called the Pima braves together and then did something seldom if ever done by an Indian woman.

She asked the fighting men of the tribe to gather in four days and follow her into the Apache country where it was her desire to kill with her own hands the first Apache they encountered.

Astride a buckskin-colored pony they started, armed with Indian war clubs, bows and arrows.

A Murder

Many miles from home they caught an Apache on the open desert. Two Pima braves held him while Eunice put spurs to her horse and riding full tilt she smashed him with her war club, killing him.

Back home again she went through the old Indian purification rites necessary after a killing. But they brought no peace to her heart. Sleep went from her and her mind was in a turmoil.

One Sunday she stood in the doorway of the little adobe Presbyterian church and heard Dr. Charles H. Cook, after whom our school is named, preach on the theme The Forgiveness of Sins.

Scarcely believing what she heard there, but hoping against hope it might be true, she sought out the old missionary.

In her own language he explained in detail what seemed to her almost unbelievable, the old, old heart-touching story of the love of God for repentant sinners.

Forgiveness—Yes

"But I killed a man," she said. "Could he forgive me, too, after what I've done?"

In wonderment she believed, and the "burden of her heart rolled away." They knelt together on the dirt floor of Dr. Cook's humble adobe home and a soul—an Indian soul was born into the kingdom. She was baptized and taken into the church. Later she was a most faithful member of the missionary society.

I knew her well. At her last camp meeting I talked with her. She was past eighty. It seemed fitting to ask her after such a long life what was the greatest experience in her entire life.

With a soft angelic sort of smile, for she was not far then from the heavenly gates, she said with a glowing face, "The greatest and the most wonderful thing that ever happened to me was God's forgiveness for my killing a fellow man."

A Result

Her fine Christian influence helped later to send an exceptionally gifted nephew to Cook Christian Training School. Antonio B. Juan, the nephew, is "one of the greatest Christians I ever knew."

* * * *

As we work among our Indian friends at Lybrook Indian mission, we have the hope that we, too, may be able through sharing our "Good News" in Christ to produce other Eunice Moragos. The transforming power is ours to share and witness to. Let us pray that our workers may be effective witnesses and that lives may be transformed and redeemed. Bro. Ernest Ikenberry's Second Annual Report concludes with these significant words: "After two years of mission work here the outlook seems bright. However, no quick growth should be expected. The older generation is very slow to change and we shall need to look with faith upon the young folks and children as our future church members and leaders."

In another place in his report he says, "We begin to see enough interest that before too long an 'inquirer's class' on the meaning of Christianity and church membership can be held."

Brethren Attend Conference

emotionally by ignorance, superstition and the effects of social prejudices. More than one and one-third million youngsters were picked up by the police last year, nearly half a million were brought before the courts and forty thousand were sent to institutions for delinquents, she said.

Dr. Eliot scored the human waste that results from turning handicapped children away from schools, forbidding them to mingle freely with other children of their own age.

At the concluding plenary session on Friday morning, interpretations of sectional meetings, held daily the first three days of the conference, were presented.

Final event of the conference was a fellowship luncheon for delegates and Clevelanders in the arena of the public auditorium. Highlights were an address by Mrs. Mildred McAfee Horton, chairman of the Division of Christian Life and Work and vice-president of the National Council of Churches, and the presentation of citations for outstanding achievement in social welfare to four individuals and one church. Dr. Mayo gave his evaluation of the conference and the Rev. William J. Villaume, executive director of the Department of Social Welfare of the National Council of Churches, gave A Look Ahead.

Mrs. Horton deplored resistance to social change in the name of the Lord and called on the church to clarify its stand on the changes brought about by the revolutionary ideas unleashed by the church itself. When society is ready to move into desegregation, she said, the church can greatly retard its achievements if it is not ready to accept the inevitability of its Christian teachings.

Next Steps

1. Some of the Brethren delegates to the conference are preparing articles for subsequent issues of the Gospel Messenger on different aspects of social welfare in the Church of the Brethren.

2. The Brethren Association of Welfare Workers in co-operation with the relief and rehabilitation department of the Brethren Service Commission of the General Brotherhood Board is considering plans to hold some district or regional conferences on the church and social welfare.

3. A study booklet based on conference reports will be published for lay people in May 1956. Copies will be available from the Brethren Service Commission, General Brotherhood Board.

4. Social welfare is to be the subject of the first co-ordinated emphasis of denominational social education and action boards. It will begin Sept. 15, 1956, and extend to the following August.

5. National leaders of all the co-operating churches, both boards and staff, will convene in January 1957 to consider the policy of the churches and a program of action.

Renz was our guest speaker at a morning and an afternoon service. Four of our women attended the district women's work summer meeting at the Painter Creek church. Our pastor attended the leadership training school at Camp Mack and the ministers' seminar. The young people raised sweet corn as one of their projects. They canned over 200 cans from what they could not sell, part of which will be sent to Brethren Service workers. At our council meeting we held our election of church and Sunday-school officers. It was also decided to continue through the month of September our two preaching services on Sunday morning. Several of our women attended Camp Sugar Grove Aug. 31-Sept. 1. Our young people joined with other young people in the district in helping to can tomatoes for relief. We participated in the Achievement Offering.—Ethel Manning, Covington, Ohio.

Berkebile of North Manchester, Ind., and a pastor of our church for nineteen years, was guest speaker. Our ladies aid meets each month.—Mrs. Irene McGowan, Peebles, Ohio.

Pleasant Valley—We were host for the community Bible school. The offering from the school was used to send a goat overseas. The young people's class invited friends for a fellowship and play night at the parsonage, ending with a campfire and meditations. The young people also met in various homes each Monday night for Bible study during the summer. The church has been using the first Sunday night of each month for Bible study which is led by our pastor, E. S. Hollinger. The third Sunday morning in August, Bro. Moyne Landis gave a talk in our church concerning his trip to Europe. Four of our young people are attending Manchester College this fall. We are happy to have a good response for the Manchester March of Progress. Our pastor's wife, Mrs. E. S. Hollinger, was dean of the women's camp at Camp Sugar Grove the first of September. Some

Studies in Brethren History

Floyd E. Mallott

"Who are these Brethren" is certainly answered in this most recent comprehensive Brethren History.

The author, Professor of Church History, at Bethany Biblical Seminary, Chicago, Illinois, is well qualified for the writing of this volume. Since Professor Mallott has a wide knowledge of world history with a philosophy of history, this book presents not just an orderly record of events, but an interpretation of history. Brethren history becomes all the more interesting when evaluated in the light of world affairs. 384 pages cloth $3.75

Great Joy to All the People

Over Judean hills rose a shining star, and a song was heard and a promise given:

"Behold I bring good news of a great joy . . . to all people—"
Good news to Joseph, and Mary the mother,
Good news to shepherds who guard their sheep,
Good news to Bethlehem, crowded and busy,
Good news to Nazareth and a carpenter's neighbors;
Great joy for the children of Israel, God's chosen,
And joy to all others who hear the good news.

"For God so loved the world—"
The little worlds of Bethlehem and Galilee,
The world of the empire, brutal and busy,
The first century world that made martyrs of Christians,
And our world, still brutal, still pagan, still lonely and lost.

"He gave his only Son that whoever believes—"
Among the disciples who sat at his feet,
Or the persecutors, like Paul, who looked on his face,
Or the Gentiles who watched for crumbs from his table,
Or the slaves who ask for their freedom from bondage,
Or children who find him in chapel and classroom;
Whoever believes and wherever they find him—on a Navajo reservation, in an African village, in a European refugee camp, in an Ecuadorean schoolroom, in a village church in India—
Whoever, wherever, among the world's people
"Should not perish but have eternal life."

Give through your church this Christmas, that men everywhere may know Christ

Visitors Take Note

Someone came to our church recently and left this note: "Who ever heard of a Brethren church closing its doors on Sunday night? Disgraceful—A Stranger." There were cars parked all around and had he looked he would have found thirty-six people having wonderful Christian fellowship in the social hall.

I wonder if you would make a note in the Messenger concerning our program here at Phoenix, especially since we do have many visitors from out of state. Our morning services begin with Sunday school at 9:00 and church worship at 10:00. We are out of church by 11:15.

Evening services begin at 5:30 with a sack lunch. We have a singspiration and a vesper message. From 7:00-8:00 we have a study session in the little chapel. At present we are studying youth and adult problems in connection with a statewide study being made by Christian churches. Next month we will study stewardship.—Henry W. Esbensen, Phoenix, Ariz.

The Church and Mental Hospitals

No doubt you published John Root's letter on The Family Counselor to get the opinion of others on the good it does. I have never yet seen the editors give the wrong, that is unbiblical, advice. Any person or church that ceases to condemn sins and does nothing but encourage righteousness is a dead spirit. It is difficult, anyway, to do the positive without condemning the negative. Jesus did both. We should follow him. God bless the family counselors with greater wisdom.

Many of our young people learn their ideals from advice given through this column. I remember thirty-five years ago, and also see the young folks now, hungering to learn the comments from spirit-filled advisors concerning various troubled cases so that I could form my own opinions of just what are examples of sin and how to overcome it.

Last year, Oct. 16, I had a letter published in the Messenger appealing to the church to get busy and help the inmates of insane asylums. I dared not write at length or the letter would never have gotten out of the so-called hospital. The attitude of the church toward those inmates destroys all faith in the church. The nonchurch people, also, say, "See the hypocrites. The church is nothing but a gouge."

There are actually hundreds of people in mental institutions who never had a thing wrong with their brains. They were just put in for spite. We don't have to go to the Communist countries to see that happening.

Jesus said, "I was in prison, and ye visited me not."—An Inmate.

Travelers

I see by this week's Messenger that Dr. William R. Cannon has retraced the journeys of St. Paul and that he is the only person ever to have accomplished such an undertaking.

I have just finished reading for the third time a book called In the Steps of St. Paul, by H. V. Morton. He made four journeys to the Near East to get the material for writing this book. He has the map in it and every place he visited is marked. He is supposed to have stopped at every place St. Paul visited. He has also written a book called In the Steps of the Master, a most wonderful book.—Lettie R. Cunningham, Vienna, Va.

A Discrepancy

May I call attention to what seems to me a discrepancy figure?

In Nov. 12 issue (page 16), J. Edgar Hoover is quoted as saying in effect that only 1/14 of $20 billion or less than $1,500,000,000 is given annually to churches in the U.S.

In the Nov. 19 issue (page 19), the figure of $1,688,000,000 is given as being contributed by Protestant denominations. (I take this to mean in the U.S.—Am I right?) And what about the contribution of Catholic and Jewish churches?

The cost of crime is terrible, but we may lose more than we gain by exaggerating the truth with actual figures. I do not think the $20 billion is too much, but that the $14 to $1 is wrong.—O. E. Gibson Westmont, Ill.

Enjoy Family Counselor

I would like to say how much I enjoy the column the Family Counselor and hope it will still be printed. I think the ones in charge give such fine advice that is most helpful. We all have our trouble and need advice at times.—Mrs. J. B. Allen, Staunton, Va.

"RENDER UNTO GOD . . ."

Ruth B. Statler

ELMER WINE's fist hit the table with decided emphasis, upsetting the small piles of coins before him, "I tell you, brethren, something's got to be done. Either more money comes into the treasury, or else . . ."

"Or else what?" Alvin Forney interrupted quizzically.

"Or you can find a new church treasurer. I have warrants to pay out two hundred seventy-six dollars. There is a balance in the bank of eighty-nine dollars and ten cents; here is only forty-two more. The bills keep coming in all the time."

"I told you we couldn't afford to raise the pastor's salary now." John Dunlap cut in. "We could cut back there."

"And have me carry along his grocery bill again?" William Bouch, the grocer, complained.

"I've been wondering," Henry Rose slowly began, "Couldn't we skip the mission offering this year? We could use the Christmas offering here."

"I heard the ladies discuss a bazaar today. That would help," Mr. Forney confided, "if we could persuade them to give the proceeds to our treasury."

The footsteps of the pastor were heard outside the door. The members of the board of finance softened their voices to greet him.

. . . .

Dinner was awaiting the pastor when he entered his home.

"That was a good sermon," his wife commented encouragingly as she brushed some lint from his shoulder. Then, "We simply must squeeze a new suit out of the budget for you. I don't seem able to keep the frayed edges from showing badly anymore. Perhaps at the secondhand store where we found this one . . ."

"It's no use, Dorcas; if I got a suit there would be no money for gasoline, and the tires are getting too thin for safety. I expect I should trade the car in for a bike," he added laughingly.

"How would the members get to conferences?" she remarked sarcastically. "Unless, of course, you would get one built for two or more."

"And Henry Rose asked to travel with us to district meeting next week. Mrs. Rose needs their car to take the children to school. They live a whole half mile from school, you know."

"Oh, dear! I had so hoped we could go with him this time. That will mean one hundred eighty miles round trip and other expenses." There was a hint of despair in her voice.

"We'll manage somehow; we always have." Now the pastor's words reflected worry. "But sometimes, dear, I am almost tempted to quit tithing. The total offering was just over forty-two dollars, and five of that we gave today."

"O Lowell, you couldn't!"

"No, I know we couldn't and wouldn't. It would be wrong. But I feel so strongly that I have failed in my preaching and teaching, and even example seems to mean nothing." A deep sigh escaped him. Then he slowly continued, "When I remember that at least six of our members have weekly incomes greater than our monthly salary, I have to fight a bitter fight to keep my faith strong and my perspective right."

"Tithing has been such a source of blessing to us; we couldn't be happy to spend the Lord's money on ourselves," she commented with conviction.

"You are so right," he replied as he bowed his head and thanked the Lord for the simple meal of meat loaf, potatoes and corn.

Down on the next block from the parsonage the Wine family was enjoying a sumptuous meal of steak with all the trimmings. As was usual at the Sunday dinner table, the conversation centered about the church service and the offering. Today the pile of unpaid bills was mentioned.

"But, Daddy, why don't the people give you enough money to pay all the bills?" eight-year-old Harriet demanded. "When Mother says she has bills you give her the money."

"There is enough money in the treasury," Mrs. Wine cut in. "There are just too many bills. Anyway, you are much too young to understand such things; eat your dinner."

Harold, the high school senior of the family, was thoughtfully silent for a while. Then, "Dad, does Pastor Hady tithe?"

"Yes, I guess he does. But it's beyond me to imagine how he thinks he can afford it. But then if he earned what I make he couldn't possibly do it; it would be too much to give," the father answered.

Harold tried to follow that line of reasoning, but somehow it just did not add up to the right answer. Something the pastor had said in his Sunday-school class a few weeks before stuck in his mind. Nor could he forget the sight of that frayed coat front. He had not noticed it until today.

The family conversation had turned toward Christmas which was only six weeks away.

"Business has been unusually good this year," the father was saying, "I think we shall really splurge. Sister, how would you like to have twenty-five dollars to spend just as you like?"

"O Daddy, really!" Harriet exclaimed, bouncing in her seat. "Just what I want to buy for you and Mother and Harold and. . . ."

The man nodded, then turned to his son, "Harold, you have been a big help to me in the business. I believe you ought to have a bonus of one hundred dollars."

"Thank you, Dad, that is generous." But there was no exuberant note in the young man's voice.

Just two weeks later Harold walked into his father's office. "Dad," he said when they were alone, "have you and Mother bought a Christmas gift for me?"

"Not yet, son; is there something special you would like?"

"Yes, there really is. I was thinking that if it is all right to you, I'd rather have the cash as a gift, any amount you had planned to spend."

"Well," the man nodded, "I thought I had given you plenty of cash, but if you are sure you want it that way it's all right. About fifty dollars, maybe."

It was the week before Christmas. Pastor Hady came into the kitchen looking radiantly happy.

"Who was here, Lowell? I heard the door close." The minister's wife looked at him expectantly.

"Harold Wine. I'll never again say that preaching and teaching and example do not bear fruit. God does provide the increase." Then he added laughingly, "Especially when the frayed coat edges are evident enough."

On the Sunday before Christmas Day the pastor walked reverently to his pulpit as the organist began softly to play the offertory.

"Today," he began, trying to control the lump which threatened to choke off his words, "today before we give our ma-

GOD WITH US

G. WAYNE GLICK

There was light on the hill, as a star shone out of the sky,
And the singing of heaven came down to the watching few,
While the friendly camels, many a league away
Silently knelt on the sand.

Then a first-born Child was laid in a mother's arms,
And tears from a pondering heart fell down on his face,
Then the Word of a God who speaks and who moves was given:
The Root and the Star.

And the mother of Everyman, locked in an age and a time
Looks to that moment in wondering hope and in joy,
Though princes continue to march, and the peoples may rage
In this time, claiming oath,

For there is a victory. Led in the light of his Light
We may walk in the faith that, though crosses may stand on our hills,
And the mothers of men may weep for their loved, lost sons,
This Light shall not fail!

The Divine Imperative

Everett M. Fasnacht

THE present-day church has a highly favorable field in which to follow the divine imperative of Matt. 28:19. The prospects for advance are such as commend themselves to every thoughtful Christian.

(1) There is an increased awareness in many lands that the world's problems are basically spiritual. Not only are Western peoples newly conscious of man's basic inadequacy; older cultures are stirring too. Many countries are undergoing social and economic revolutions. People in many lands are deepening their spiritual roots. Although some, having lost faith in their old gods, are ready to discredit all religion, there are many signs of rejuvenation in all the world's religions.

(2) Colonialism is receding, making it possible to demonstrate in new ways the separation of imperialism and the Christian cause. In some non-Christian eyes missions are still the "running dogs of imperialism." But with nations achieving political independence, missions have a clearer opportunity to serve, to be partners in religious ventures, to disassociate themselves from un-Christian aspects of Western culture.

(3) There is more interchange of ideas between cultures than ever before. Caste restrictions are breaking down. Horizons are broadening. An atmosphere is created in which non-Christians are more receptive to the word.

In some mission lands nationalistic elements draw attention to the "foreignness" of Christianity. Still even anti-Christian movements seem blessings in disguise in that they bear testimony to the effectiveness of the Word and the world-wide program of the church.

(4) The spiritual battle rages at the point where Christ's kingdom makes contact with the world; and there are sufficient areas of tension there to allow the church plenty of scope for its activity. Living on the frontiers of the kingdom is challenging—things happen.

The church has different types of frontiers: geographical (through home and foreign missions); ideological (alternative service, peace education); economic (relief and rehabilitation); educational (Sunday Schools, seminary and colleges); spiritual and moral (counseling, intercession, evangelism).

The Christmas season is a good time for every Christian to rethink the Christian imperative and how it applies to himself. We are reminded of Paul, who said, "I am again in travail until Christ be formed in you" (Gal. 4:19). What are you doing that Christ be born in another soul? Are you not challenged to join yourself to those on the frontiers of the kingdom, offering yourself in fuller, deeper consecration? What kind of support do you give those now on the church's frontiers? Are you concerned that the church enter opening doors around the world?

What does Matt. 28:19 say to you?

Whose Birthday?

IT IS a strange commentary on our Christmas customs that some employees have had to band together to campaign against alcoholic Christmas parties. In Miami, Florida, a group of women employees in downtown department stores have organized so that they can persuade their bosses to keep liquor away from office parties.

Yet the leaders of this movement, who want merely to urge their employers to respect the wishes of nondrinking employees, have tried to remain anonymous because they say that reprisals have already been threatened against them. Some employers have protested that the women have wanted to make a religious party out of an office celebration. The women have replied, "Well, if they are using a religious holiday as an excuse to have a party, why not make it a religious party?"

Why not, indeed? Christmas can and should be a time for happiness, and certainly there is a place for Christmas fun. But even a Christmas party, though it is not intended as a worship service, can be conducted in a manner that would be appropriate for the birthday of Jesus Christ. From the reports we hear of many office parties, they are frequently so loaded with intoxicants that they cause otherwise respectable persons to forget their own standards of decency. Is it not blasphemous to plan such occasions in connection with a Christmas observance?

If Christmas is the right time for office parties then the women employees in Miami have the right idea in insisting that "since Christmas is Christ's birthday, the parties ought to be planned to please him."—K.M.

"Everywhere, Everywhere, Christmas"

AFRICA

"Joy to the World"

James B. Bowman

Wadi a'i, Mthlagu ga si! . . ." "Joy to the world! The Lord has come!" With a lusty rendition of this old hymn, the Christmas program comes to an end at the little chapel at Gulak in Nigeria, West Africa. For us it is the close of a program with many reflections, surprises and, occasionally, even shocks, as it unfolds before us.

The program takes place out of doors, where there is space for all the action and for the larger group of visitors from the town and village. They sit on the ground under a large ebony tree and watch the drama with varying degrees of interest and amusement. For there are usually those who pay little attention to the story itself and see only the antics of some of the actors. But, of course, to others it is the re-enactment of the beautiful Christmas story they have learned to love.

The service begins with two or three favorite carols and a prayer. Perhaps there is a very brief speech of welcome to visitors and an introduction to the Christmas story and maybe even some suggestions for appropriate conduct among the audience. Then the "drama" begins.

Each scene is preceded by the reading of the appropriate passage from the gospel story. Then it is enacted, not neglecting any detail present in the scriptural account, but including many others which the actors consider appropriate to the setting in the original time and place.

First, of course, is the annunciation to Mary, as she is grinding corn and chanting her grinding song. This is quickly followed by Joseph's soliloquy over his dilemma. He is, as the Margis say, "between the horns and the ears" ("on the horns of a dilemma," in English). While he planes a board in his shop, he pauses often to think and express his problem, sometimes very pointedly, until the angel appears to him with words of comfort and guidance.

Next comes Caesar's decree, proclaimed loudly around the whole crowd, for each to go up to his ancestral home for taxation. As a result, we are shown the arrival of a number of people, one or two at a time, at the inn of Bethlehem. Profuse Eastern greetings are exchanged and bargaining for places to stay begins. By the time Mary and Joseph arrive the inn is full to bursting, and the innkeeper, worn out by the hard day, is fretful and roughly turns Joseph away. However, his wife has observed Mary's plight and pleads for her. At last, arrangements are made for them to stay in the stable behind the inn. It is represented by a small shelter of grass or mats. Here among the animals, sometimes symbolized by the presence of a lamb, the greatest event of history takes place.

Next we are out on the hills of Judea, where the shepherds are getting the sheep rounded up in the thorn corral, represented by a circle of cornstalks laid on the ground. These shepherds are the clowns of the play, and dress their parts, wearing all the paraphernalia of one who spends long periods out of doors and carries everything with him, including charms. At last the imaginary sheep are settled, the guard is set and all is quiet. Suddenly the angel appears with his surprising announcement and is soon joined by the angel choir, many of whom we know are not so angelic at other times!

One of the most amusing, as well as thought-provoking, experiences occurred during the shepherd scene one year. By complete surprise to everyone, a photographer flashed his bulb at precisely the moment when the shepherds were awakened only to have a shepherd exclaim, "This light! What is this wonderful light!"

The portrayal of Herod's court would be of special interest, if not amusement, to most Americans. These people are familiar with the ways of kings and chiefs, their pomposity and egotism and the intrigues of court. So they make ample use of this opportunity to portray it, if not caricature it! Usually Herod screams in a jealous rage, "What! Another king?" When the wise men come from the east, they are set to searching their books for prophecies of this king and, with great flourishings and turnings of pages, finally come up with the correct passage. Then one can fairly see the wheels turning in Herod's head as he sends them on their way and promises that he too will go to worship if they will only bring him the information on their return journey.

"We Three Kings" is rendered verse by verse by three men, dressed picturesquely in their long oriental robes, and each bearing his gift as the verses of the song indicate. They greet Joseph and Mary in proper Eastern fashion and then reverently present their gifts. Night soon overtakes them on their way, and they sleep beside the road. In their sleep, they are directed to by-pass Herod, which they hurry to do.

Following the example of the three wise men, the congregation now offers its gifts of homage to the new King. In material value, the gifts are not remarkable, a small calabash of peanuts, cotton, beans, guinea corn, rice, a squash and other crops. But to those who know the people, we realize that these gifts have about them some of the quality of the widow's mite and, for at least a part of the group, are the symbol of the dedication of a life.

What if every member of the church in America would give a gift of that quality during this wonderful season? If we would dedicate ourselves and give such gifts, what great things we could do for him, the Prince of Peace!

Christmas in Ecuador

THOUGH far from sleigh bells and snow-covered roof tops, in a land where the temperature will jump up into the nineties and the baby will get his daily sun bath, everyone is still very conscious that December 25 is a special day. To the Indian street sweeper it means a day's vacation and perhaps a sack of candies for the children; to the domestic servant a hard day's work in preparing for the celebration of the employer's family—but a nice bonus check; for the school children a special program and perhaps treats; and to the richer people a gentle reminder from their poorer friends that this is Christmas and they await their gift.

The Indians celebrate a Fiesta del Niño (Festival of the Little Child) anytime from middle November to the end of January. It begins with a special mass, of which they understand practically nothing, and ends with just another drunken feast and is one of the lesser fiestas of the year.

In our mission school more emphasis is put on the Christmas program than any other program of the year, in hopes of bringing some of the great joy and happiness and expectation of that season.

Among the mestizo and upper-class people of the towns and cities one finds quite a number of traditional Christmas customs. First of all, the nativity scenes are prepared and every home has its own. In the churches too, appear beautiful scenes, and afternoons or evenings are spent in visiting the various churches of Quito just to see, and worship, these scenes. Christmas trees appear only a day or so before Christmas and are soon laden with gifts which will be distributed on Christmas Eve. After those rounds of gift-leaving are made, families and relatives usually gather together and have the big Christmas dinner at midnight. Chicken tamales, bonuelos, a type of pastry similar to doughnuts without a hole, and pristiños, another fried pastry, dipped in syrup, are a few of the more traditional Christmas foods. Some families wait till January 6 for their gift-giving—the holiday observed here as the day the wise men gave their gifts to the baby Jesus. Some children still place their shoes at the door or bedside for papa Noel to leave his gift for them.

In recent years the stores have begun to stock more and more foreign items. The windows are full of plastic toys, cellophane wrapped perfumes and aftershave lotions. And the simple homemade tree decorations are rapidly being replaced with imported tinsels and bright-colored balls and lights. Christmas in Ecuador is rapidly becoming an imitation of Christmas in the United States.

Christmas at Falfurrias

Stanley Bittinger

THE mesquite and cactus of south Texas, together with the ten-gallon hat and high heeled boots, are the traditional badges of this transitional area where the cultures of Mexico and the United States have mixed and fused during the past one hundred years. Although giant herds of cattle and gun-carrying cowboys are now less common, vast vegetable fields and citrus groves occupy the time of the many hundreds of American citizens of both Spanish and American ancestry. In addition, there are Mexican migrants who work the cotton fields and the oil wells and who bring with them the rich folk culture of Mexico. To this mixed group Christmas means many things and is celebrated in a variety of ways.

Modern American commercialism with its cheap tinsel, extravagant presents, Santas and gaudy Christmas trees is well established even here where snowy winters are unknown and where Santa's sleigh would need wheels instead of runners. Trees, presents and decorations are a part of every home's celebration regardless of language or income of parents.

Every home likewise celebrates family reunions with tasty Christmas dinners. Families of Spanish, or Latin American, backgrounds have colorful meals of tamales, chalupas, frijoles and enchiladas, especially made with meat and seasoned for the occasion. Other families have the traditional turkey or some other special meat. The majority of families hunt their turkeys and shoot them wild on the prairie. The important factor for both types of families in the poorer groups is that for once there is meat on the table in some abundance. New Year's day is also celebrated in like manner.

Christmas means that presents are exchanged and visits are paid to local churches. The majority of the Spanish-speaking folks go to special services at the Catholic church, this being the only time that many ever enter a church during the year. A novel contribution from Spanish culture is the tradition of the piñata. On Christmas afternoon, a specially prepared papier-maché container, the piñata, decorated in bright colors and often in the shape of an animal or doll is brought out and suspended, full of candy, from the ceiling. Two children are then blindfolded and given short sticks with which they endeavor to strike the piñata. Other children are given their turns until some lucky contestant strikes the piñata and throws a shower of candy to the floor. There follows a mad scramble for the candy amid shouts of joy and laughter.

The Falfurrias Church of the Brethren has an annual Christmas program in which parents and children participate in both Spanish and English. Baskets of food and clothing are then taken to many needy families in the community—a practice much appreciated by the families who receive and by those who participate in the preparation of the baskets. The young people have introduced Christmas caroling, a hitherto unknown, or little practiced, custom and, hence, have aroused considerable comment and surprise throughout the neighborhood. Many early recipients of this caroling were indeed astonished when young people gathered outside their homes to serenade them with Christmas hymns.

The church here seeks to demonstrate to this community a different emphasis for the Christmas season—an emphasis upon giving, upon service to others in the name of the Prince of Peace whose birthday we seek to celebrate on December 25.

Christmas Multiplied

Walton Z. Moyer

"ADVENT, Advent, Advent, Advent, Weihnachten!" boomed the voice of the pastor and more than a hundred pairs of eager children's eyes followed his motions as he rhythmically counted to five on the fingers of his outstretched hand. It was the fourth and last Advent Sunday before Christmas and the Sunday school was giving its annual presentation. The biggest public hall in the village was literally packed with people. Not only parents, but also relatives and friends, were on hand to watch the children perform, sing and recite. Glowing faces revealed the true joy and happiness in the hearts of these German folk.

In a few short days, Christians all over the world would be celebrating the birth of the Savior. In Germany, however, this observance had begun in November with the first Advent Sunday. It was on that day that the thoughts and attentions of many families were focused on the coming of the Christ Child. The importance of this Advent season can be partly understood when one realizes that the first Advent Sunday before Christmas marks the beginning of the new "church year."

Lighting the first candle on the Adventskranz within the fellowship of the family is the dramatic and meaningful tradition inaugurating the Advent season in German homes. On each successive Advent Sunday families gather again to light an additional candle until, finally, all four are burning brightly.

One experiences something deeper than sentimentality by observing this weekly candle-lighting custom. Mounting expectancy and the assurance of Christ's coming are intensified. The simplicity and humbleness of this procedure makes each Advent Sunday a vivid reminder that God in his infinite love for man sent his only Son to be the Light of the world and Redeemer of mankind.

Walton Moyer

Walton Moyer (right) joins the family of Pastor Standau in Niederkaufungen, Germany for Christmas Day. Pastor Standau is playing from the Brethren Hymnal given him by Walton Moyer

Thus, for German families, each Advent Sunday is a periodic celebration of Christmas. Moments spent at home with loved ones in the living room scented with twigs from a Tannenbaum and the smell of honey-wax candles are unforgettable. To a German, Christmas and home are almost synonomous. To him, being in the family circle is the natural and longed-for way of spending the holiday season.

Music plays an important role in the lives of Germans and is therefore a means of expressing Christmas joy. An Advent celebration will invariably feature the local Posaunenchor. This is a choir of brass instruments which are constructed especially for church music. Boys learn to play an instrument as a Y.M.C.A. activity and sometimes continue to play in the local brass choir for several decades. Organ music, too, is highly appreciated in this country. There are always opportunities to hear masterpieces of music played by some outstanding organist. Around Christmas time, the mellow tones of pipe organs are indeed inspiring.

Not to be overlooked is the love of singing. Fine choirs have established reputations of excellence. On the local scale, one finds enthusiastic participation in singing groups. Church choirs, however, are generally small and limited in talent. Most singers join the community choruses or men's choirs which usually offer fine programs on all main occasions. It is really a joy to hear groups of children singing. Kindergartens, children's homes, and hospitals as well as local children's groups devote much time to the learning of many fitting songs for all seasons.

German literature includes a wealth of Christmas stories, poems and legends. Many of these can be heard from the lips of those who memorized them as children. The Christmas story from Luke 2 is naturally a favorite piece of literature, not because it is a fine translation by Martin Luther, but because it tells the good news of the Savior's birth.

The Advent season ends with the long-awaited-for Heiligen Abend, known to us as Christmas Eve. On this evening churches have vesper services which are well attended; gifts are exchanged; and the Adventskranz is replaced by the candlelighted Tannenbaum. No one goes caroling on Christmas Eve because everyone wants to be home with his family. This is the time hearts are really warm.

As Christmas Day dawns, the familiar sound of church bells fills the air. After the service, families usually remain at home or visit close friends and relatives. Children find their companions and either show off their gifts or go sledding at a favorite spot. December 26 is the "second day of Christmas" and is celebrated almost exactly like the first. Time is spent with family and friends after a morning church service. This holiday atmosphere lingers the whole week.

It could be assumed that all Germans enjoy a wonderful Christmas celebration. But that is not the case. Thousands of Germans cannot fully appreciate the meaningful traditions of the holiday season. Results of a war which ended over ten years ago leave many families separated and much sorrow at the loss of loved ones. How many tears are shed by lonely old folks and others who are not included in a "circle of family love"? And how is Christmas spent in a crowded refugee camp? Soft candlelight . . . being home . . . singing . . . family and friends . . . security . . . so many people are denied these privileges. Day-to-day existence for them is a battle. But still the Christmas message is heard, and as God is allowed to work in willing lives, no matter how unfortunate, the birthday of Jesus is celebrated quietly and repeatedly throughout this joyous season.

Christmas in Greece

Mary Alice Klees

IN GREECE shepherds watch their sheep by night on the hillsides; the stable for the donkey and the cow is under or adjoining the house; babies are wrapped in swaddling clothes as they were when Jesus Christ was born.

Preparation for his birthday begins with a fast. The more pious fast for forty days while others fast only one week. Many eat nothing the day before Christmas because the Blessed Virgin was in pain on that first Christmas Eve.

On December 25, very early in the morning, the bells of every church throughout Greece are rung. The faithful start gathering in church at five o'clock in the morning. In many villages candles are the only source of earthly light for this occasion. The priest or priests read from the Prophets and the Gospels concerning the birth of Christ. The worshipers stand for the entire service which takes about three and a half hours. After the service those who are prepared, having fasted and confessed, take communion.

When the service is over, the little boys go from house to house singing carols for cookies and small change.

The rest of the day is very much like any Greek holiday. Family and friends visit and are given Christmas cookies with which many wishes are exchanged.

In the afternoon all, dressed in their very best clothes, go for a promenade on the main street of the town. As friend meets friend, greetings ring with the joy Christ's birth brought to earth.

In Athens and other large cities the wealthy have adopted many Christmas customs from Central Europe and America. Even so, gift-giving is for most part reserved for New Year's Eve, with Saint Basil visiting the small children. This saint is not nearly so universal as Santa Claus; there are many poor children whom he never visits.

Christians, awake! salute the happy morn,
Whereon the Savior of the world was born;
Rise to adore the mystery of love,
Which hosts of angels chanted from above.
With them had joyful tidings first begun
Of God Incarnate and the virgin's Son.

He spake and straightway the celestial choir
In hymns of joy, unknown before, conspire;
The praises of redeeming love they sang,
And heaven's whole orb with alleluias rang;
God's highest glory was their anthem still,
Peace upon earth, and unto men good will.

Christmas Joy

Laura Sewell

CHRISTMAS is coming! These words echo around the world. In the little village of Samor and the larger town of Anklesvar in Bombay State, India, the Christians are preparing for their Christmas celebrations. They do not think of trees and Santa Clauses, nor do they think of how much money they have to spend for gifts for one another, nor do they think of the bills that come after Christmas is over. These things would seem very strange to them. They think of stars and angels and songs. They have one gift to give. It is their offering of life, time and substance to the Christ Child.

At Christmas, time has no meaning. In a spirit of fellowship and great joy every Christian takes part in the Christmas program. These programs are varied and almost extemporaneous. True, the plays and pageants have been practiced but on the day of the performance it is not unusual to add to the speeches what one considers needs to be said, or to bring extra props if such seem necessary at the moment. The program may last two, three or even four hours. No one is left out if he or she wishes to contribute to the joy of the occasion.

The Christians of Samor are very poor. Some years ago there was a small mission school in the village. A large government school was opened and so the mission school closed. The old master continued to live in the house and to lead the Sunday services. There were no new converts. The young people were forgetting the Christian ways. Then, in recent years, Chiman, Ramanlal and Bhagvan, three young men became very interested in awakening the young people to Christianity. They organized a young men's association. It was this association that took over preparation of the Christmas program last year. With their drums, cymbals and bells, with their picturesque costuming and with their use of real sheep in the pageant telling the old, old story, they brought gladness and joy to the Christian people who were hearing the story once more. They brought hope and light to the non-Christian, many who were hearing the story for the first time.

After the program the people did not go home. They continued to sit out under the bright starry sky, listening and taking part in the singing of the Christian anthems of joy. Some young children wrapped in old clothes or covers slept on the ground; others were carried home to bed. Slowly, but surely, the crowd dwindled. The moon sank to rest and all was dark. Gradually the light grew in the east as the sun neared the eastern horizon. Only then did the singers stop their songs and depart to their separate homes for the beginning of a new day's work.

In Anklesvar the same joyous abandonment to spontaneous expression, although a little subdued, is present. The program is more limited in time. The offering of money is a little larger. There are more new clothes to be seen. But, on the whole, the same spirit of joy and gladness is felt in the beat of the drums and the ringing of the bells. In Anklesvar there is a church in which to worship. The church board appoints members to prepare the program. With the help of the department heads, each age group takes part in the service. Not at night as is usual in villages, but in the morning the people gather on Christmas Day. After the songs and plays the speaker of the day gives a few words of love and peace. All the congregation, mostly all Christians, friends and relatives, feel anew the need of reconsecration. From the church they go to their homes. The rest of the day is spent in visiting and sharing with one another Christmas joy. There will be singing and laughing and much joy.

In India Christmas is a religious day—it is a holy day. It is a family day when the people

EGYPTIAN CHRISTMAS

WILMA D. ROWE

This year no pine wreath decorates my door
As has been true on Christmas Day before;
No holly decks the wall, but in its place
The palm groves, with their dusty, native grace
Supply a shadow from the weary sun
As older palms, I like to think, have done
To give refreshment to the Infant Guest
Of Egypt. No mock-shepherds, pageant-dressed
Sing carols in a lighted church at night;
But in the street at day's receding light
The ragged shepherds pass; and camels file
As they have done for ages by the Nile.
In Egypt, Christmas stirs the spirit more Than has been true on Christmases before!

of God the Father meet to remember the birth of the Father's Son. It is a singing day when all God's children join voices in singing of the birth of the King, the Son of God.

"Today sing a victory song, sing a victory song!
Today sing with the angels.
Sing Victory!"

It is a giving day when all happy Christians give of themselves in appreciation of the blessings they have received through the birth of the Savior. It is God's day!

Christmas in Navajoland

Olivia D. Ikenberry

TO MOST of us, Christmas means beautiful carols, programs whose main theme is the birth of Jesus, and gifts for those less fortunate than we. Christmas is a time of sharing and of joy. In our homes it is perhaps a beautiful tree, gifts and a traditional family Christmas program. All in all it is a time of beauty and happiness.

Not so for the Navajo. They had no Christmas till the missionaries brought to them the story of Jesus and all it means. So when we tell about Christmas in Navajoland, we will tell how we celebrate Christmas at Lybrook Indian mission.

Our Christmas celebration begins in November with the telling of the stories of Jesus' birth during our Sunday services. We also have Christmas carol records which we play at our Sunday services. The final celebration centers around our school. For a month or more before Christmas the children start learning Christmas carols and a program is planned for our Christmas school party which we have held each year on December 22. Scenes are planned for the children to portray, such as shepherds watching their sheep with the angels telling the good news of Jesus' birth; Mary and Joseph and Baby in the stable with the shepherds coming to worship followed by the wise men with gifts.

Much time goes into practicing and timing. The children help decorate the schoolroom and Christmas tree, making pretty chains and ornaments. At last the big day arrives. Costumes have been planned and tried on, the choir robes made of square, white feed sacks with a hole in the middle have been pressed.

There is bustle in the kitchen also. The turkey has been stuffed and sputters merrily in the oven. There is cranberry sauce and for dessert pretty red jello. Each child has made a construction paper basket and this he finds at his place all prettified with glitter and filled with candy and nuts as he comes to the decorated table. Last year we seated them a boy and a girl, a boy and a girl. The boys tried to change it, but we did not let them. This made for a little less hilarity and more decorum. A man from the staff sat at the head of each table and, acting as father, served the plates. It did not take long for informality to return while students and staff as one happy family ate our Christmas dinner.

Following our meal the performers were costumed, shepherds in bright-colored bathrobes, angels in white with wings covered with glitter, Mary in blue and pink and baby Jesus symbolized by a doll in a manger of hay. The kings had colored construction paper crowns covered with glitter and the choir in their white feed-sack squares had a bright red ribbon bow under their chins.

In the meantime, parents and friends had gathered in the schoolroom. Happy smiles were on their faces as the loved children appeared in the progress of the program. Several days before bright-colored feed-sack bundles had been made up with a complete outfit for each school child and a toy of some kind. Plastic bags of candy and nuts were also given each school child. Then a wrapped gift was given to each older child that had come home from other boarding schools. Each woman present was given a towel kit and each man a wrapped cake of soap. Each child other than school children was given some toy. Our Christmas party closed with cookies and a drink served to all.

In Hong Kong as elsewhere Christmas finds children opening gifts

On our first Christmas here one of the other missions along our highway did not send their boarding pupils home but kept them over Christmas. One night they piled them into two trucks and drove into our yard. To the accompaniment of a folding organ they serenaded us with Christmas carols in the snow under the brilliant starry sky. We fed them Christmas cookies before they went on to the other missions.

In Navajoland as in other lands where Jesus is known there is Christmas. Jesus came that we might have life and that more abundantly. Part of that is the joy of celebrating his birth—the joy of Christmas.

terial gifts to Him who was born in a manger, I want to tell you that a young man in our church is this day offering his life to Christ and his church to serve full time wherever God calls him. I am sure Harold Wine has prayed much about this before answering the Master's call. We pray the Lord's richest blessings upon him. Harold has offered his all to Christ today, even as Christ did. Each of us must decide for himself what of us we will give in sacrifice today as we celebrate his birth."

The audience sat silent and misty-eyed as the offering plates went by.

After the service the board of finance sat as usual about the table in the classroom opening envelopes and recording the gifts. The piles of coins were growing higher today and the bills were keeping pace with them. Then Henry Rose opened a white envelope and silently read a note. Without a word he passed it on, with the accompanying bills, to the treasurer.

Harold Wine's father read quietly, "For world-wide missions, to my Savior and King on this his birthday. Harold Wine."

He unfolded the money, one hundred and fifty dollars. "His life and this too," he mumbled.

His eyes filling with tears, he arose and walked out into the sanctuary and stood before the wooden cross on the small altar. Soon three others joined him.

That same evening the pastor and his wife went into the church alone and also stood before that same small altar. As they bowed their heads they thanked God for the surrendered life of one young man and for the four men who that day had joined the fellowship of tithers; also for all people everywhere who render unto God what is his and what He asks, whether it is life or material gifts.

As the two opened the door to leave the church, soft snowflakes swirling through the air hit their faces, and the world seemed full of the music of the choraleers. They stopped to listen.

"O come, all ye faithful, joyful and triumphant."

The Family Counselor

The Family Counselor welcomes letters of inquiry. They may be addressed: Family Life Department, General Brotherhood Board, 22 S. State St., Elgin, Ill.

Dear Family Counselor,

The women in our church have a problem. How can we get our young pastor and his wife to see their mistake in failing to discipline their small children? We fully realize that a pastor's children are no different from other children but we also realize that pastors and their wives should try to set an example. Will you discuss this at length? We feel that too many young pastors' wives need help on this question.

Concerned.

Dear Concerned,

Preachers' children ought to set a good example. This is the principle, but it is not good practice to constantly reiterate it. On the other hand, parishioners ought not expect more of the preacher's children than of any children, remembering that children are children.

Your long letter tells with some feeling of a situation in which a minister's child is not a good example. You report misdemeanors, discourtesies and thoughtlessness which are often to be found in all children. The letter evidences a close and aggressive scrutiny of the conversation and activities of the preacher's wife and of the little misbehaviors of his child. Doubtless your conclusion that the indulgence showered upon the child has helped to make it obnoxious is correct, but much of what you report you acknowledge as being hearsay.

Not infrequently this kind of problem has been made more difficult by the attempt to qualify every act of a minister's wife and children. Certain personal duties and intimate responsibilities in the life of the minister and his family ought to be respected as a private, rather than a parish, concern. It is questionable if the discipline of a minister's children is "the problem of the women of the church." Nor is it quite proper to blame what is happening to other children in the church on the basis of what the minister's child does. No parent may deny responsibility for his own child's acts even in a complex and interwoven society.

Every parent grapples constantly with the problem of discipline. The definition of the term has broad ranges. Samuel Butler, in the classic Victorian definition of discipline insisted that a parent "must break your child's will before he breaks yours." On the other extreme is the "little-Junior-can-do-no-wrong" school of thought. Somewhere between these two there is a golden mean in which the parent maintains rapport with the child, guides his action with love rather than with fear and thus assists his growth in the fear and admonition of the Lord.

Hawaiian girls sing carols and rejoice at the birth of Jesus

Christmas in Puerto Rico

Mrs. Jerry Davis

IF DECEMBER 25 means Christmas to you, you may be surprised to know that in one small part of the United States this is not true. In Puerto Rico the holiday season lasts from the evening of December 24 to January 6, and in some of the hill areas, for an additional eight days afterward.

For hundreds of years a real distinction was made between the religious significance of Christmas and the gift-giving and feasting which accompany it. December 25 and the evening before are almost strictly confined to a religious observance of Christ's birth. For weeks before this, carols are sung in school and church. Silent Night, Noche de Paz, It Came Upon A Midnight Clear, A Media Noche En Bethlehem—you would recognize the melody if not the words. Children's pageants are presented in school and church, and at home nativity scenes are prominent. The Christmas story is told, read, and sung everywhere.

But the gift-giving Christmas in Puerto Rico is January 6, Three Kings Day; in some countries this is called Epiphany or Twelfth Night. This day is believed to be the day the Three Kings or Wise Men arrived in Bethlehem and presented the baby Jesus with their wonderful gifts. The children here leave grass or corn for the camels and expect gifts and sweets in return.

In the hills men and boys dress up in costumes and masks and go singing. They usually go in small groups and use the traditional instruments, a guitar, a cuatro (a mandolin-type instrument), maracas, and a guicharo (serrated gourd). The singers expect pennies or candy when they visit. In the cities the kings dress more elaborately and ride on horses. They parade through the streets singing and giving candy and gifts to the children as they go.

Lechon asado (roast pig) has the place of honor on the holiday menu. Along with it goes pasteles, made of olives, nuts, meats and raisins in a banana paste and wrapped in banana leaves to be cooked, sausages, rice pudding, and sometimes rice cooked with chicken either with the roast pig or as a cheaper substitute for it.

Today these old Spanish customs are mingled with the familiar American ones of Santa Claus and Christmas trees, which are flown in from the north. The mixture of old and new world typifies Puerto Rico, the isle of contrasts.

Keep the Door Open

Mrs. Glen Liebert

CHRISTMAS is a time of much giving and receiving, a time of much rushing and planning. We enter through many doorways at Christmas time. We are pushed through many store doors—looking for a special gift for a special person. We bang through kitchen doors—fixing all sorts of "goodies" for the Christmas dinner. We quietly enter through a secret door—hiding the gift we have bought. We hurry through church doors—planning the Christmas program. But what about the most important door of all—the doorway to our heart?

At Christmas time, everyone seems to become more Christlike in their thoughts and actions. Everyone is more willing to open their heart's door to thoughts of love for the birth of the Christ child. Some people call this the Christmas spirit. This is good. It is so good that we wonder why we do not keep this spirit all through the year.

After Christmas we are tempted to go back to the busy tasks of life, and slowly close our heart's door, to the wonderful thoughts and experiences we have enjoyed.

Because of the crowd, the innkeeper was compelled to hang a

"no vacancy" sign on the door of his inn. Because of the crowd, Jesus was born in a stable—far back of the inn. He had a manger for his bed.

Let us not hang a "no vacancy" sign to Jesus on our heart's door, for almost a year, and then suddenly remove it for the Christmas season. Let us keep the door open and give Christ the choicest room in our heart. With his love, he will help us take care of the "crowds" in our lives. He will help us with the many troubles and disappointments of the coming year. He will join us in our happy times together. Our hearts will be full, but they will be filled with the love of Jesus.

An Experience in Fellowship

A. W. Adkins

ON MY way to an appointment about 150 miles away, I entered a bus and found very few passengers on it. Directly in front of me sat a large well-dressed colored man. We had not gone very far until the bus became crowded. Once or twice I noticed a white person stop in front of the colored man and gaze at him as if to demand that he give up his seat. So I asked him if he would like to occupy part of my seat. He thanked me very much and moved back with me.

I soon learned that my traveling companion was a Christian minister. He recognized also that I was a minister. Since he was not acquainted with the Church of the Brethren, he asked me many questions concerning our beliefs, especially since I told him that we had no creed at all except the New Testament.

I told him when and where our church was organized, that we accept the trine immersion for the remission of sins, that we teach and practice feet washing, the Lord's supper and communion as taught by Christ himself in the upper room, that we do not tolerate intoxicating beverages in any form, that we do not swear or take the oath and that we are against war in any form. I explained that we believe Christ was missionary minded and that our church had for years sent missionaries to Africa to educate and Christianize his people over there. My companion asked me if I would come to his town and tell his people the things I had just been telling him. He assured me that his people would welcome me.

A short time later I received a letter indicating that they had set aside a certain Sunday for me to come and speak at their morning and afternoon service. I discovered that many of our members were willing to go in a group with me to Poplar Bluff and assist in a program that we would put on. I wrote to the colored minister explaining what we would do and asking if his church would return the visit.

We chartered a school bus and about thirty of us went to his church. A fine crowd awaited us. We found a brick church with pipe organ, large balcony, a full basement and many classrooms. After we were introduced to the church, we presented our regular worship program. When I concluded my message the minister thanked us and asked me to stand at the railing around the rostrum so that everyone who wished to might shake hands with me. After that we were invited to take our places at a long table in the basement. We ate at the same table with the minister and his wife. Our members scattered throughout the room and fellowshiped with anyone who might happen to sit beside them.

The next Sunday the Negro minister and his congregation returned the visit. After I had made a short explanation as to the reason for the invitation I turned the service over to them. They had solos, trios, quartets and congregational singing, such as none can supply except a body of consecrated folks. During the noon hour everyone seemed to get the thrill of his life from the fellowship together. As they were loading the bus to start home, several of our people asked why we could not have such meetings more often. I replied that it surely would help us to get better acquainted with one another and with our God

I hope that other pastors might be led to feel the need of such fellowship with the colored race among us. We send missionaries and money to Africa to win souls for Christ. We ignore the same race around us. Many other churches are working with and for the Negroes in many places. So far as I know, there is not an organized colored Church of the Brethren in the United States.

AN OPEN ROAD

Glen Weimer

GOD DESIRES an open road into every heart—
Does he find it in you, in your situation, in your dreaming, planning, working?

God ever and again sends his prophetic Spirit to the gateway of the soul. Man can heed or keep the highway to the heart barricaded. What barricade must be removed if God is to move into my life?

God can never cradle the Spirit of his son in a crowded, earth-bound, self-reliant, self-assertive, tempestuous, busy life. Only those who are aware of their acute poverty in life, have time, aspiration and love enough to take God in.

O Gracious One, waiting so patiently to step into my life and to raise my life to the next stage of maturity, come, invest my whole being with heavenly peace, love and glory. Enable me, now and always, to breathe thee—as I breathe the clean, pure air of a brisk winter morning. In likeness to Christ. Amen.

A number of resolutions were adopted, including plans for a $900,000 Evangelical hospital to be built to aid the people of Puerto Rico. Carper, Jerry Davis, Domingo Torres and Angel Velez.

Brotherhood Theme: Seek First His Kingdom

A Department of Radio and Television has been established by the National Lutheran Council. Five of the eight Lutheran groups participating in the council will co-operate in the department. Another aim will be to assist local pastors in more effective use of broadcasting facilities.

Two workshops on the planning of stewardship education and methods of the financial canvass were held recently under the leadership of Harl Russell, secretary of stewardship education. The one in the Central Region brought forty-eight ministers and lay leaders to North Manchester, Ind., on Nov. 21 and 22. Thirty-five pastors and lay leaders attended the one at McPherson, Kansas, on Nov. 16. According to Bro. Russell, these men will be available as counselors to local churches. Their names and addresses will be released soon after Jan. 1.

Pennsylvania has more conscientious objectors than any other state in the nation. Selective Service headquarters in that state have listed 1,706 conscientious objectors. The Commonwealth ranks at the head of the list because of the large concentration of religious groups in Pennsylvania that oppose military service. Maj. William C. Halfpenny, Jr., who directs the CO program in the state, said 627 persons are currently working in civilian assignments in lieu of their armed forces service. Some forty-seven of Pennsylvania CO's are serving overseas in such countries as Israel, Africa and Greece, where they are active in mission work or local rehabilitation projects.

Clergymen are among the lowest paid professional workers in this wealthy nation, according to a survey by the National Council of Churches. Dr. Benson Y. Landis, associate director of the council's department of research and survey, said that a study of reports for 1953 submitted by three of its larger affiliated denominations showed that while some ministers' salaries are increasing slightly they still do not keep pace with those of laymen. He said, "Probably more church members and laymen generally are feeling increasing concern about pastors' low salaries. That may account for the rise in salaries. But, in terms of food and clothing, the clergy still do not come off as well as the average member of lay society."

Ordained to the Ministry

Kenneth H. Hershey, in the White Oak church, Pa. Bro. Hershey has accepted the call to serve the Long Run church, a mission point of Eastern Pennsylvania. He and his family have moved to that community.

United Church Center Planned for Pennsylvania Council of Churches

A United Church Center to be used to house the offices of the Pennsylvania Council of Churches is being planned in Harrisburg, Pa. The co-operative church agency now represents nineteen denominations with a constituency of three million. Other church agencies will be invited to occupy space in the new structure when it is completed. Dr. Jesse D. Reber is the present general secretary of the council.

Protestants Spend Billion Annually for Welfare Purposes

Protestant churches in the United States spend more than a billion dollars annually to provide health and welfare services for 11,000,000 persons, according to a study made public at the first National Conference on the Churches and Social Welfare. The report disclosed that nearly 500,000 doctors, nurses, case workers and others carry on welfare work in nearly 3,000 church-related agencies and institutions. The study showed that Americans in all walks of life benefit from these services.

India Christians Total More Than Eight Million

According to figures published by the National Christian Council of India, Christians in that country now number 8,166,000 out of a total population of more than 361,000,000. The greatest population of Christians is in the southern state of Travancore-Cochin, where there are almost 3,000,000. About forty-six per cent of the country's Christians are Roman Catholics. India's largest non-Catholic churches are the Orthodox Church of Malabar and the Church of South India.

Church Building Boom Biggest in Northeast

The greatest percentage gains in the present religious building boom are being registered in the northeast section of the United States. This section includes Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania. Permits for the erection of religious buildings issued during the first half of 1955 showed an increase of twenty-eight per cent over the same period in 1954 in this area.

Studies Problem of Religion in Public Education

Representatives of Roman Catholic and Jewish groups participated as observers in a three-day conference on religion and public education sponsored in St. Louis by the National Council of Churches and the Church Federation of St. Louis.

Thomas H. West of the Church Federation of Greater Chicago read to the conference a tentative policy statement prepared by the National Council committee. "Religion," it said, "has a functional significance for life in the sense that, without any reference to any theological understanding of his nature, God is recognized by individuals, by society in general and by government as the ultimate sanction of conscience about right and wrong, as the ultimate standard for uprightness of character and the expression of character in daily living. It is here asserted that people who have differing theological understandings of religion can agree about the practical ways in which religion functions in the lives of people. It is also asserted that this way of thinking about religion can be communicated without recourse to controversial theological definitions. As commonly stated by educators, it is possible to 'teach about religion' within the framework of a democratic educational process."

Medical Supplies Sent to Aid Pakistan Flood Victims

Medical supplies and blankets have been rushed to West Pakistan in response to a cabled request from the director of the West Pakistan Christian Council who described the flood disaster there as "the most terrible in Pakistan's history." Two million people including 150,000 Christians were involved in the West Pakistan disaster. A shipment of 300,000 antimalarial and antipneumonia treatments for emergency use in the disaster area were rushed by air from New York by Church World Service.

Methodists Plan 1956 "Mission to the Nation"

Christian "commandos" will be utilized by the Methodist Church in a nation-wide effort next June to reach America's estimated 69,000,000 unchurched. The commando teams will consist of three ministers and three laymen organized to promote personal evangelism by canvassing neighborhoods for prospective church members. Alan Walker, noted Australian evangelist, will be the visiting preacher for the American campaign.

Federal Migrant Aid Proposals

The Federal Government has just approved a fourteen-point series of recommendations as the first step in helping improve the living and working conditions of the nation's two million migrant crop-pickers and their families. The President's Committee on Migratory Labor is proposing for adoption by state governments a transportation code which would make riding from job to job safer for migrants, and a housing code which would provide "a good supply of decent housing."

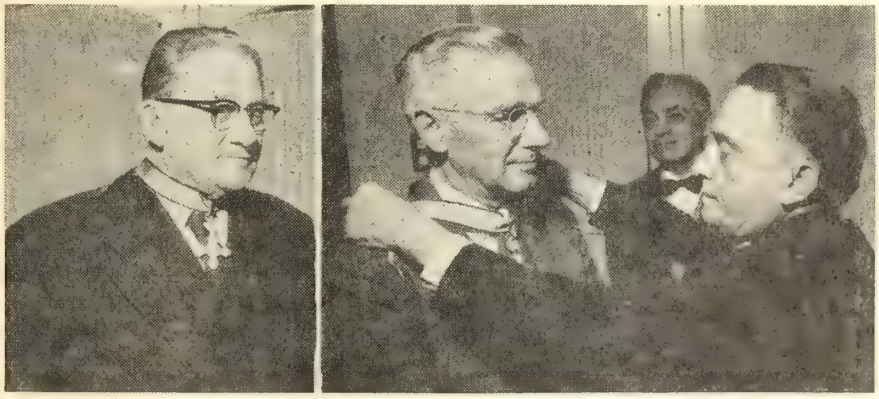
The committee is also preparing an annual worker plan which would schedule work for large groups of migrants. The executive secretary of the President's Committee paid tribute to the work of the National Council's Migrant Ministry program which reaches 225,000 migrants in 27 states with services ranging from worship to social recreation, literacy classes, crafts, clubs, child-care centers, "make-up" schools for children who have fallen behind in their studies, vacation church schools, family nights and personal counseling.

150,000 Arab Refugee Children Need Food

Arab refugee children, born since the partition of Palestine in 1948, are not eligible for United Nations assistance and do not receive rations through that intergovernmental agency. They have to rely almost solely on voluntary relief food gifts from CROP and other voluntary agencies, according to Russell Hartzler, a member of the Church of the Brethren and Michigan state CROP director, who visited Europe and the East. He stated that about 150,000 children from one to seven years of age fall into this category. He said they do not qualify for ration cards since they were not considered displaced refugees because they were born there.

Set Week of Prayer for Christian Unity

Jan. 18-25 has been set aside as a Week of Prayer for Christian Unity by the Commission on Faith and Order of the World Council of Churches. The commission issued a prayer leaflet intended for use in special services over the world. It has been printed in English, French and German.



The leaflet states, "Prayer for unity is like prayer for daily bread. It cannot be careless, occasional prayer. It ought not to be offered only during a special week of the year. And yet there is manifest value in emphasizing this petition to God at a time when Christians of many communions and confessions can join together."

Included in the leaflet are suggestions for daily Bible reading and also for intercessory prayer.

Protestant Churches Join in World Wide Attendance Movement

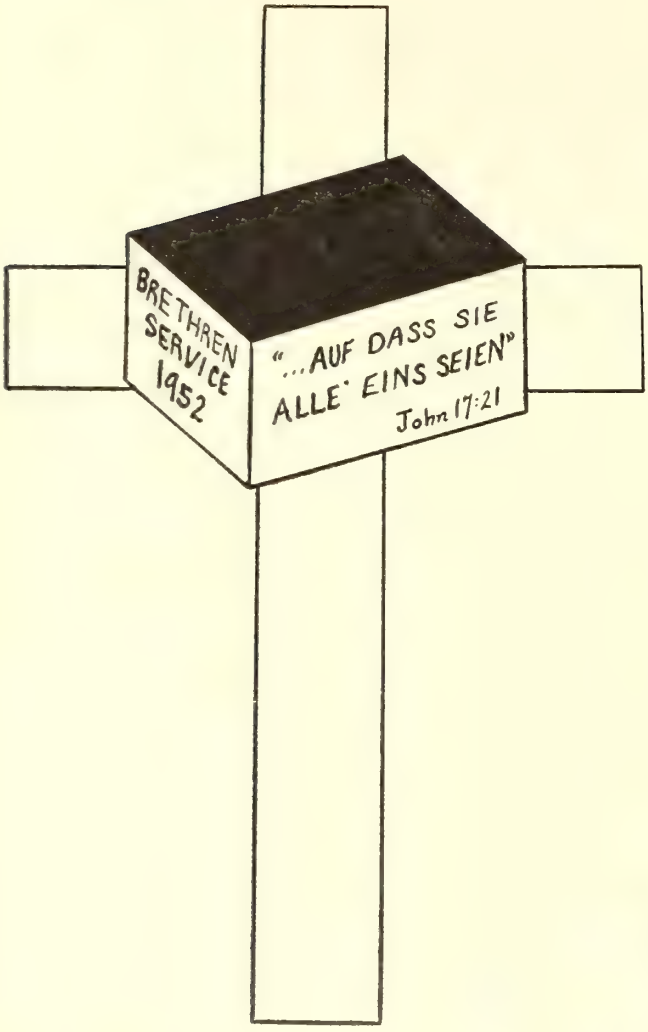
Many Protestant churches are joining in a World Wide Church Attendance Movement which seeks to encourage regular churchgoing habits, especially during the time from New Year's to Easter. The movement is planned to give churches an evangelistic thrust in 1956 by increasing membership and support through regular attendance, prayers, gifts and service.

In January, participating churches will concentrate on developing strong Christian homes. During February and March the emphasis will be on lining up prospective new members. These people will be received into local churches on Palm Sunday or Easter. The concluding phase in April will stress integration of new members into church activities.

World Council of Churches

The Order of the Phoenix was presented by the Greek ambassador to Switzerland (right) to M. R. Zigler, director of Brethren Service in Europe (left), and to John D. Metzler, Sr., in charge of the surplus commodity distribution in Europe for the World Council of Churches. The presentation was made on the behalf of the king of Greece at Berne, Switzerland, on November 2. The Order of the Phoenix is awarded to those "who have served Greece well" in different fields of humane and technical endeavor. Bro. Zigler received the order for his promotion of Inter-Church Service in Greek villages, which has worked to better living standards, especially through agriculture demonstration. Bro. Metzler was given the award for his distribution of food and other commodities to the needy of Greece

News Briefs



The 519 congregations of the Evangelical Mission Covenant church of America will soon participate in a drive to raise $1,750,000. One million dollars of the amount will be used to develop North Park College in Chicago. The remainder will go to expand the ministry of the denomination in foreign missions, home missions, youth work and publications. A pension fund for ministers' widows also will be established.

One hundred nineteen students from twenty-five countries and from forty member churches of the World Council of Churches are studying under ecumenical scholarships this fall. Also included are seven students from nonmember churches. Scholarship openings for the ecumenical program have been provided by churches and educational institutions in twelve countries.

Protestant clergymen have reported an unprecedented revival of interest in religion among South African youth in the past two years. Membership in Christian youth organizations has increased by twenty-five per cent during the period. And young people are "flocking up to the church by the thousands."

Youth for Christ International operated 1,956 high school Bible study clubs last year. The clubs reached about 25 per cent of the country's high schools and "won an estimated 23,000 to Christ," according to Jack Hamilton, director of the program. The organization hopes to double the number of such clubs during the 1955-56 academic year.

Because the BVS training unit, which completed its work at New Windsor early in November, had given several days at the beginning of its period to helping out at Stroudsburg following the flood disaster, the work of material aid processing at the center fell behind schedule. On their own initiative members of the unit decided to try and catch up even to the point of working one all-night shift. As a result of their effort 136,387 pounds were processed during October.

The Social Service Cross

Walton Z. Moyer

THE Brethren Service cross is a good symbol. It stands for the positive, constructive work being done in the name of the church. However, Brethren Service work in Europe is no longer merely "giving the cup of cold water" but is also performing the new role of social action which ministers to mind and spirit in addition to meeting physical needs.

The drawing of the cross, using the cornerstone of Brethren House in Kassel, Germany, attempts to illustrate this part of our service. "That they all may be one . . ." is no dream, it is a reality. Brethren Service in Europe seeks to expand spiritual services to fellow members of the body of Christ.

Since its dedication in 1953 the House has become a symbol of peace and brotherhood on a continent so recently torn by war and hate. More than fifty volunteers have returned to America. Their terms of European service laid a strong foundation for intensive social action and spreading the "message of the cornerstone."

Current programs are leaning more and more in this direction, pointing to Christian unity with our foreign brothers. The effectiveness of our efforts depend upon the continued support of the Brotherhood.

WHERE CAN I FILL A NEED?

Kits like those described on pages 9 and 10 of the Material Aid Handbook are greatly appreciated by refugees. Lorene Clark, BVS'er from Wichita, Kansas, who recently began working in the camp for refugee girls at Westertimke, says: "Such gifts not only have a practical value, but also help to keep alive the spirit of peace and brotherhood in which they were given."

Send your gifts through the Brethren Service center in your area to those overseas. For copies of the handbook or other information concerning the kits, write to the Director of Material Aid, Brethren Service Center, New Windsor, Md.

UNIFIED MISSION IN A DIVIDED COUNTRY

Max E. Snider

LOVE, peace, service and understanding are words whose meaning knows no boundaries; their feeling crosses national borders, racial lines and language barriers. If the meaning of the words is not expressed in acts there develops insecurity, suspicion, mistrust, false representation, lack of care, hate. Brethren Service chooses to show the meaning of these words through acts.

In this past summer Brethren House in Kassel has seen more than five hundred guests and visitors come and go. Of this number many were persons from the East Zone of Germany. Three East Zone boys heard of the Brethren and came to see them; after meeting them the boys returned time and again for fellowship.

Through their summer school vacation the boys were working in the West Zone, where they can earn more money for better food and clothing. A group of choral singers who sang in the Kassel city hall needed over-night facilities and were offered that which we have. The many pictures they took to their families keep alive pleasant memories of their stay in Kassel. Several East Zone pastors and church sisters have been brought to us to see this American rehabilitation agency.

There were seven East Zone participants in work camps this year. They used "visiting friends" or "geological study tour" as reasons to receive permission to leave the Communist-occupied zone. They then joined and co-operated in work camps. In stating his impressions of his camp, a young Leipzig man mentioned John 17:21 and said that its world-wide meaning became very clear to him. He observed, first of all, the freedom in which the campers talked and acted; secondly, the respect that everyone had for his fellow campers and his nation; finally, the readiness to work together on the project and to co-operate in every other way possible. He said, "All this may seem very natural to you but it is not, at least where I come from."

Brethren House, Kassel, with the help of the Brotherhood at home, might be used to entertain and help rehabilitate persons, particularly leaders from the persecuted churches, from the East Zone. Others who would benefit from this aid are refugees in Berlin. An example of this type is an "unrecognized" refugee who is a crafts leader in a Berlin camp. Unrecognized means that he is a refugee, but not recognized on religious, social or political grounds of persecution, and therefore cannot hold citizenship and a paying job in the West. There are 450,000 people in this class in Berlin. The crafts leader has given his valuable services to the camp in exchange for his board and room; now he needs a rest. Perhaps he could spend two weeks in the House with the use of all our facilities. He could rest and learn to know Western Germany. Temporarily he could forget the depression of his work. He would recuperate with better food and enjoy a positive environment.

Our nice basement room could also be used to give a weary and tired East Zone pastor a vacation of recuperation where he need not be bothered by cares and worries for each day. The incoming pastors would be from the "other" part of the divided country. It would have to remain secret, for knowledge of their contact with Americans could mean punishment, imprisonment or other harsh action to the pastors' families. The natural boundaries cannot be crossed without special care while hate and suspicion are present. Only sincere selfless love and service lead to peace. They cross all borders and are understood!

Exchange students newly arrived in Germany: Shirley Ulrich, Jane Brumbaugh and Mary Lou Zimmerman in Schwarzenau, Germany

An Exchange Student's First Impressions of Brethren House

Mary Lou Zimmerman

MOST of us have heard quite a bit about the work of the Brethren Service Commission in Europe and about Brethren House, Kassel, Germany. But few of us actually have the opportunity to see them first hand. As an exchange student to Germany for the coming year I have been fortunate to be able to spend some time at the House and see the work.

When I first saw Brethren House I was impressed with its size and location. I had expected to see a rather small house situated in the country. Instead, an attractive modern two-winged house located at the edge of the large city of Kassel met my eyes. The green lawn and colorful flowers bordering the House made a warm and appealing picture.

I found as I entered the House that the warmth was also present within. Immediately I felt that I was taken into the close Christian fellowship of the Brethren House family of volunteers. I found in the family a prevailing atmosphere of friendliness and a balance between fun and seriousness which impressed me very much.

Because Brethren House is the center of the Brethren Service program in Germany, one can imagine all the work and activity that goes on. It amazed me that the young people of our church are the ones who are carrying so very much of the responsibility connected with this work. They are doing a really wonderful job.

I am very grateful to have had the opportunity to become acquainted with this enthusiastic and co-operative family and to form my own impressions of Brethren House.

Do You Know the Brethren Lesson Material?

A series of questions and answers about graded lessons for Church of the Brethren church schools developed by Hazel M. Kennedy, editor of children's publications

What are graded lessons?

Graded lessons are materials for use in schools having classes for children of each grade or age. Although our Brethren Graded Lessons are closely graded, they may be used in smaller, group-graded schools by using the materials on a cycle plan. The children's editor would be happy to suggest a plan for any small school desiring to use the Brethren graded lessons.

The Brethren Graded Series is a permanent curriculum; that is, it is used from six to ten years and then revised. Some part of the series is always in process of revision. Revision helps us keep abreast of the new developments in Christian education. The revision of the junior materials was completed this year. Currently the kindergarten and junior high materials are in the process of revision. Because this material is permanent it cannot carry dates for any particular year.

How are graded lessons prepared?

Interdenominational lesson committees composed of editors and consultants outline the courses, planning the sequence of units to achieve balance and meet the needs of growing persons. The committees carefully develop objectives, outlines and descriptions of the units. Each denomination using these outlines adapts them for its own literature.

We co-operate with the American Baptists and Disciples of Christ in producing our graded lessons. Editors from the three groups work together. The printed materials (Judson or Bethany, as the case may be) are edited by Brethren for our imprint edition.

How is the Bible used in Brethren Graded Lessons?

Brethren Graded Lessons rest squarely on the Bible. The Bible material is chosen to fit the age of the pupil. It is chosen for a definite purpose with consideration to the underlying teaching and the context.

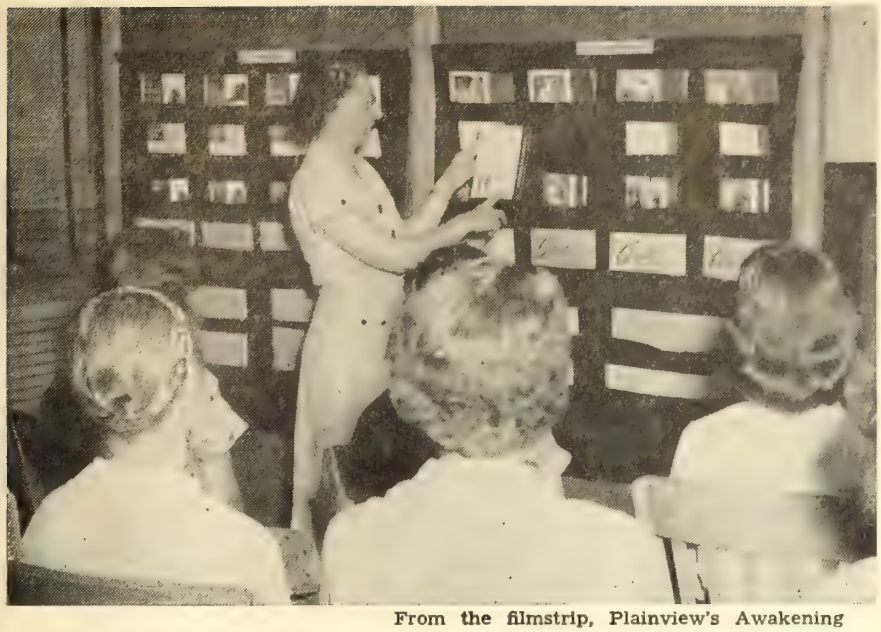
The Bible is the primary source of materials for the child's spiritual growth. The graded units are always centered in Bible teachings. However, since this curriculum is developed with the life-centered approach, some story material is taken from life itself. Jesus taught in this way and it is believed that he was demonstrating a teaching method which reaches the child and makes the truth meaningful and easy to apply to his life. There is need for this especially in achieving the ability to be Christian in personal relationships and developing a Christ-like awareness of others. By the methods used in the graded lessons, the Bible becomes a vital, useful book in which the child learns to take delight. Christian living becomes a wholesome, happy experience.

The Bible is an adult book; therefore, we must select carefully the portions that we use with children. These principles of selection are grading, readiness and growth toward a mature understanding of the Bible.

Bible materials are used for these purposes: as stories, to convey facts, to develop a faith, to develop ideas of God, to lead the child to know Jesus, to provide materials for use in worship, to interpret experiences, to guide conduct, to share our cultural heritage, to develop appreciation of beauty. Thus the aim of our use of the Bible reaches beyond the transmitting of information about the Bible and its contents. The central meaning and heart of the Bible, the materials which add historical setting making the events and teaching real, and those things which contribute vividness and interest to what is of central importance are all included in the Brethren Series.

What is a unit?

A unit is a group or series of lessons organized around a central theme or purpose. All the Bible material, pictures, stories, plans and activities for the group of lessons, or unit, contribute to that purpose.



Units are planned to lead the growing person step by step in relationship to God, Jesus, the church, the Bible and others and to develop Christian character. Materials organized in this way provide many worth-while experiences or opportunities for learning.

How does the teacher who uses Brethren Graded Lessons get ready to teach?

First, the teacher must assemble his tools: the Bible, the Teacher's Book, the pupil's home book, the activity materials, the picture set and the Message to Parents. Each piece is important and all are related to every other piece.

The teacher reads the articles in the front of the Teacher's Book. These articles contain much helpful information about the course and about the children for whom the lessons are intended. Next he reads the introduction to the unit and then all the related material in the pupil's book. Now he is ready to read the session plans, looking up and reading the Bible references, noting the activity materials and studying the teaching pictures. At this time the teacher also reads the sections in the Message to Parents which relate to this unit.

This is advance preparation, done before getting ready for the first session. At first glance it may seem to take too much time, but teachers who follow this plan have found it to have many advantages over week to week preparation and teaching.

From the filmstrip, Plainview's Awakening

A parents' and teachers' meeting provides a good opportunity for teachers to explain how the pupils' books can be used in the homes

There is a sense of direction and a feeling of ease. There is opportunity for the children, especially the juniors, to help plan some of the activities. There is likelihood of getting variety in teaching, thus avoiding dull monotonous procedures. There is the advantage of being able to deal with children's questions which anticipate something considered in a later session. (The teacher can give a satisfactory answer and then say, "We will learn more about this next week.")

Is it difficult to use Brethren Graded Lessons?

No, teaching with Brethren Graded Lessons as tools is not difficult. Neither is it easy. It takes preparation to teach well. Anyone using Brethren Graded Lessons should first read the introductory articles in the Teacher's Book. This is as important as reading the instructions accompanying a new household appliance. And it insures using the tool as the producer intended. This does not mean slavish following of the suggestions in the session plans without imagination, originality and adaptation to the situation. It does mean recognizing the needs of children as the determinant in selecting areas for study and experience. It also means using the pupil's book as a home-reading piece, a part of the child's religious library. It means using the activity materials creatively.

Why are there books instead of leaflets in the nursery and primary materials?

We recognize the importance of the home in Christian education. By providing home reading books for the pupil, we are helping the home with its part in the Christian education of the child. Booklets have more permanent value than do separate leaflets which can easily be lost if given out weekly. The attractive booklets become a part of the child's religious library to be treasured and enjoyed. In the teacher's book and the Message to Parents are references to the pupil's book. The former tells how to stimulate use of the pupil's book at home and the latter gives appropriate guidance.

What can be done with the kindergarten leaflets?

The kindergarten materials do not have pupil books at present. In order to be consistent throughout the children's department, but more especially to achieve as many of the values of the pupil's home reading book as possible, we suggest that the leaflets be fastened together each quarter and sent to the home. When the kindergarten materials are revised there will then be pupil books for all ages.

What about the pupil's books for juniors?

These books continue the emphasis on home-church co-operation. They are for the junior's use, alone or with his family, as he may wish. My Bible Guide, the pupil's home reading book, contains material related to that used in the class sessions. It is supplemental material and will enrich the sessions for the junior at the church school. It is not divided into thirteen sections, corresponding to the thirteen sessions in the quarter, but is to be read and reread as each boy and girl wishes to use it. The teacher's session plans contain specific references to the material in the pupil's book.

What kind of activity materials are available with Brethren Graded Lessons?

There are no packets of handwork materials with the nursery courses. The children in this department need other kinds of activities rather than handwork.

Packets of activity materials for each child are a part of the kindergarten and primary courses. The Teacher's Book gives suggestions for using these handwork sheets in a creative way.

To teachers who say, "These handwork sheets don't fit the lessons!" we reply, "Some sheets may have activities to illustrate a story. More likely the activity is to illustrate the lesson or idea in the story, the purpose of the session." The latter is more creative and desirable.

The Work and Study Packet is designed for the use of juniors in the class session. While the work on these sheets is done in the church school, some of them are to be taken home for further use there. The envelope is used as a file in which the pupils may keep all their materials until an activity is completed or taken home.

The use of these materials in any department is not the only activity the teachers and children will engage in during the church school sessions.

What are activities?

Activities are experiences by which the children learn. They are a part of the lesson and not something to do "after the lesson." Activities will help the child to grow in his understanding; children learn by doing. The Teacher's Book lists activities of many kinds, all planned to help children develop Christian personalities and grow as persons.

Why should Brethren use the Brethren materials?

Throughout all the graded lessons, the underlying principles and doctrines of the Church of the Brethren are included. This is especially true in the primary, junior and junior high materials. They are not found in nondenominational materials.

The Church Abroad

"Jesus Christ, Son of God"—this is the conviction which the Nigerian Christian is finding a rich treasure for his life and his people

Irven Stern

Nigerian Brethren in Review

THE Brethren in India, Nigeria and Ecuador prepare periodic reports for the Foreign Mission Commission. Here is the Nigerian report submitted for the November meeting.

The Government and Missions

This year has seen a marked change in the official attitude of government toward Christian missions. The year began with rather stringent restrictions on the work of the missionary, especially in relation to work among the Moslems. Close co-operation among all the Protestant mission bodies led to a conference with the lieutenant governor, as a result of which the situation was greatly clarified and improved. The most important result of the conference was the setting up of an agreement between government and missions, by which the missions agreed, in effect, to exercise no coercion in religion, and the government agreed to recognize certain approved missions.

Church Extension Program

At the end of 1954 the membership of the Church of the Brethren in Nigeria stood at 1,715. In addition there were more than 1,500 covenant members. During the first half of 1955 baptisms totaled 216 and 209 additional Nigerians had taken the covenant.

By mid 1955 the outvillage evangelistic arm of the church, the program of classes of religious instruction, has grown to include 103 C.R.I.'s with 110 Nigerian workers, and 3,200 children being taught reading, writing, and arithmetic and the basic tenets of the Christian faith. More than 7,500 are hearing the Christian message in worship services as a result of this program.

Other advances are being made in religious education through preparation of literature and through training courses. Plans are being made for opening a Bible School.

The first two men of the mission area to be called to the full ministry were ordained this year. Four other Nigerians have been licensed to the ministry and two of these will be ordained in the near future. The mission is co-operating with the Sudan United Mission in planning for a Union Theological Seminary.

During the year the Church of the Brethren completed its entry into the fellowship of the Churches of Christ in the Sudan, known from the initials of its name in Hausa as TEKAS. One man from our area was elected to the board of trustees of this organization.

During 1954 the indigenous church contributed more than $2,800 and assumed complete support of the Nigerian ministry and a large portion of the support of the evangelistic program. Two congregations have almost completed new buildings and a third is beginning to raise funds for a building.

Educational Program

Enrollment in the junior primary schools has increased from 1,709 at the end of 1953 to 2,540 in 1955. This has created many problems in finding space for classrooms. One school has reopened after a year of inactivity, one new school opened and preliminary plans were made for a dozen other places. Ninety-six Nigerian teachers are teaching in twenty schools. On the negative side, increasing pressure is being brought against the mission by both Moslems and Roman Catholics.

Three new senior primary schools were opened this year making four such schools with a total enrollment of 172. In addition to the missionary staff four trained Nigerians were teaching these schools.

Waka Training Center continues to grow both in enrollment and in the training opportunities offered. An apprentice-training program in carpentry and masonry was launched recently for boys who have completed junior primary school. During the year the government granted approximately $33,000 to Waka.

The bulk of the administration of the schools, particularly with reference to teachers' assignments and teachers' problems, is being carried on by the joint church-mission education committee.

Rural Development Program

An increased emphasis in the rural development program is evident. Four trained agriculturists on the mission staff (two of whom give full time in teaching agriculture and related subjects and one who gives full time to extension and supervision) and eight other missionaries with assignments in other areas but with special interest in the rural development program assist in a program designed to help the rural people in a material and advisory way without creating a paternalistic relationship. The program which is carried on through schools, churches and individual contacts includes projects in animal husbandry, field crops, soil and water conservation, horticulture and forestry.

New Work

This year saw the completion of two new mission stations. Stover Kulp at Mubi has initiated a new type of work with his attempt to co-ordinate and strengthen the witness and outreach of the various Christian groups located in this large city. The first four baptisms took place there in July.

The John Grimley family began work on Nov. 1 at Uba in a new language area, the South Margi. This station will assume guidance of some of the work formerly carried on under the supervision of the Lassa station.

There is every indication that permission will be granted for a new station at Mbororo among the Higi people.

Medical Work

Owing to the use of new drugs the population at the Garkida Leprosarium has been reduced and the turnover increased. Emphasis is more in rehabilitation through surgery and special care and on preparation for return to homes rather than on long-term care. In the year which closed March 31, 496 cases were discharged as symptom free. Of 781 cases in residence 144 were new cases admitted during the year. The leprosarium continues to be a powerful force for evangelism in spite of rapid turnover. About 75% of the discharged patients are either baptized or covenant Christians. Three treatment centers and five segregation villages, three of which opened this year, assist in leprosy work.

At our two general hospitals 15,528 individuals, of whom 1,826 were inpatients, were treated during the year. Surgical and obstetrical cases are increasing. In our four dispensaries, three of which are government registered, 7,659 individuals were treated. Application has been made for the registration of the fourth dispensary.

Recent construction work for medical purposes included a new surgical building, outpatient housing facilities, concrete ramps and walks at Garkida and a dispensary building for students and families at Waka. A new outpatient block at Marama and an isolation ward at Lassa are under construction.

Projects in the field of preventive medicine include training in hygiene and sanitation, establishment of local health boards, eradication of mosquito breeding places, antimalarial and smallpox vaccination campaigns.

Four registered Nigerian nurses now assist in the medical program. Sixteen Nigerians are in training at co-operating mission hospitals.

Technical and Building Program

Two missionaries and two Nigerian assistants give full time to the maintenance of twenty-one vehicles, and to the care of the electrical equipment and diesel generators at the hospitals.

Three full-time and three part-time mission builders have supervised and assisted in the construction of five new residences during the year, four new storehouses, a classroom and office building, a food and equipment store, five boarding compounds, a new assembly hall at Hillcrest, Nigerian staff houses, a rest house financed by missionaries, and five school buildings in addition to the medical buildings listed above. Roads were also built and repaired by this group of workers.

Mission Administration

The mission continued to take long strides forward in the area of administration by Nigerian Christians, with Nigerians being given increased responsibilities in making decisions and solving problems in the field of education, evangelism, leprosy work and labor problems. The medical committee is studying means by which Nigerians can assist in this highly technical program's administration and the mission looks forward to the time when Ngierians can assist in administration on the field committee level.

Mission Staff

The eight young men who have come to Nigeria under the alternative service program have made a valuable contribution, both in their work and their positive witness for peace. They are much appreciated by staff and Nigerians alike. The attempt has been made to make it clear to the Nigerians that one of the reasons for the coming of these young men is that they do not believe the use of force is consistent with the teachings of Christ. It is difficult fully to appraise the contribution of the alternative service program to the mission in Nigeria, except to note that these people carry a huge load and to wish we had more like them.

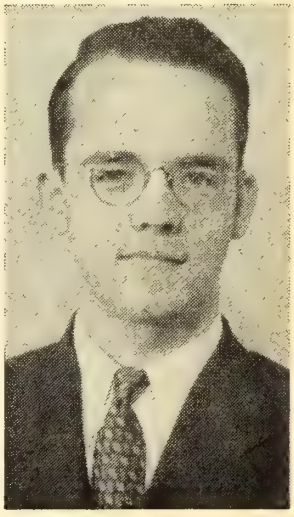
Staffing of the mission program this year has been difficult for three main reasons: the large number of first-term missionaries who, though capable and willing, have been handicapped by lack of knowledge of the language; the rapid furlough turnover, and the lack of medical personnel.

Minneapolis Church Observes Fiftieth Year

Earl E. Snader, Jr.

ON SUNDAY Oct. 9, 1955, the First Church of the Brethren, located at the corner of 36th and Emerson Avenues, North, in the northwestern part of the city of Minneapolis, had a special observance to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the church. This marks the end of a half century during which the church has served the Brethren living in the Twin Cities area. Bro. William M. Beahm, dean of Bethany Biblical Seminary, was the guest speaker for the day, and Bro. Beahm's stirring messages will be long remembered and considered as time goes by and the work at Minneapolis is carried on. His theme in the morning worship service was A Cloud of Witnesses, and in this message he reminded us once again of the fact that those who have gone on are looking to us for the fulfillment of their hopes and the answer to their prayers. He reminded us also of the fact that there is a "gallery of witnesses" who are now the spectators to the work that is being done.

In the evening Bro. Beahm spoke on the topic, I Will Build My Church, and led us in a consideration of the purpose Christ had in mind in his well-known answer to Peter's confession. The foundation of the church has and always must be faith in Jesus Christ, in all his glory and Saviorhood.



There was a full house in the morning and good crowds at the afternoon and evening sevices. After the ladies of the church served the noon meal everyone gathered in the sanctuary for the afternoon service, the main feature of which was a reading of the History of the Minneapolis Church of the Brethren, by its author, Bro. Winfield Sink. Quite a few letters of greeting had been received and these were read. Bro. W. O. Tannreuther of Waterloo, Iowa, and Sister Martha Keller, both "soldiers of the cross," who have worked with the church through past years, were present and given recognition. One charter member of the church was present, in the person of Ruth Featherstone, who had been a member of the original church as a little girl. Following the afternoon service the young people gathered at a near-by park for recreation.

The fiftieth anniversary was made meaningful for the future as well as for the past and the present by the fact that it served as the beginning point in a program of church relocation and expansion the church is undertaking.

The Brethren at Minneapolis made a careful survey of the community around the church and discovered that it is necessary for the church to relocate if it is to have an unchurched community in which to work. There are outlying sections of the city which do not have churches enough to serve the people. This is in contrast to the picture in the neighborhood of the present church where there are ten Protestant churches and one large Catholic church located within ten blocks around the church.

Therefore, the church has embarked upon a program which will bring about the relocation of the church by three years from now. This period of three years was allotted so the church may gather its resources most effectively and choose its future site most carefully. Some of the Brethren feel the job may have to be done sooner. A relocation committee has been elected and the finance committee has been working on the details of the relocation program.

The chairman of the finance committee presented the picture of the future plans of the church, not in terms of the actual building, but rather in terms of strategy, at the afternoon meeting, and the occasion became the beginning of our building fund. A cash offering and pledges for the year were received at the evening service. At the present time the actual cash in the building fund is something over $300. Pledges for the building fund for this year total something over $1,000. This is not very much, but it is a beginning and it serves to mark the fiftieth anniversary as a milestone in the history of the Minneapolis church.

The present membership of the church is seventy-nine. This represents a gain of approximately ten per cent over the membership for the previous year. Many Brethren who have moved to Minneapolis during past years have been lost to the church partly because of the temptation Brethren have to fellowship with some other larger church, partly because circumstances have made it difficult for the church in Minneapolis to serve the Brethren and partly for various other reasons which need not be mentioned here.

We hope the picture is changing. The Brethren in Minneapolis have given up the old idea that the primary function of the Church of the Brethren in a large city is to corral all the Brethren into one fold. They now share the vision of other home mission churches in the Brotherhood, that the function of the church is to witness to Christ and to bring Christ and the church to the people of the local community, regardless of what their former background or present relationship to the church might be.

The Brethren at Minneapolis feel that God has opened a door of opportunity before them once again. Such a door was opened once before and at that time they did not follow a new program which had opened to them. Then misfortune came. Now it is the desire to embark upon the new work into which they feel the Lord is leading them. The city of Minneapolis is a great metropolitan center with a population of over 500,000. The combined population of Minneapolis and St. Paul is better than 800,000 and when the population of the nearby suburban areas is added the total comes to well over one million souls.

The city of Minneapolis has many churches. The outlying areas do not have many. New housing developments are being started continually and land that was once the location of a quiet farm is now the center of a new housing development. This is the same story that is being told in other cities across the nation. The city is becoming the frontier of faith in the confusing pattern of modern living. The Brethren already have a work in Minneapolis. They are established here. Now they feel that God is indeed opening new doors of opportunity and service in this corner of his vineyard.

Pulaski—During the past year, our church has received eleven new members by baptism and three by letter. The plans for our new church are now completed and construction will begin in the near future. The men of the church are cleaning and leveling a tract of land a Loneash, a resort on Clayton Lake. The area is being converted into a picnic ground to be leased to the church on a long-term basis. Our two ladies' aid groups have been working on their respective projects. Circle I is going to furnish the new kitchen, including all electrical appliances. Circle II is collecting furniture for the new nursery and will purchase a carpet for the new church. The CBYF bought a new piano for the church, besides contributing to the district quota. Both the young people and intermediates have been represented at district roundtables, overnight or week-end camps and Camp Bethel this past year. The groups have also been enjoying joint study and social functions. The junior league has remained active this year with a variety of programs. A New Day Dawns

A NEW DAY has dawned for the world mission of the church. Awakening after centuries of darkness, many nations are alerted to a new sense of personal worth. In seeking self-expression and a better way of life, these emerging peoples are challenged by diverse revolutionary movements. ☐ Of these movements Christianity is the greatest. While yet in a minority, the Christian church has been established by missionaries in nearly every country through generations of preaching, teaching and healing. In this new day increasing responsibility is taken by national leaders to transform lives of individuals and communities through the church. In India, Nigeria and Ecuador 106 Brethren missionaries and 340 national workers team together as co-laborers to bring men and women to Christ . . .

11,000 nationals serve in the fellowship of 37 churches . . . 37,000 persons were given medical care last year . . . Christian primary schools erase illiteracy . . . agricultural work introduces new foods, better living standards. ☐ In this new day of urgent revolution for Christ, you can help through your time and tithe to provide the increased support needed. Give to World-Wide Missions of the Brotherhood through the offering in your church on Christmas.

READERS WRITE . . . to the editor

The Gospel Messenger welcomes letters commenting on editorials, articles and news. Letters should be brief and brotherly.

Brother and Professor

Bro. Kermit Eby's article, "Brother or Professor?" (Nov. 5), seems to me to be based on the assumption that unless one addresses another as "brother" one is not brotherly. Would it not be better to assume that the Christian essential most desirable in society is genuine love and respect for the personality of another and that this spirit may be expressed in a great variety of ways?

This distinction between spirit and form is one that runs through much of life. Although ours is not a "formal" church, it is possible that we Brethren have been too preoccupied with form in religion. Such preoccupation is a mistake because (1) it tends to foster the belief that there is only one form in which a certain spirit can be expressed, and because (2) it tends to obscure the spirit which prompts and sustains the forms which express that spirit.

Since the degree, doctor, is a part of Bro. Eby's personality it would not seem to me to be illogical or unbrotherly to recognize him by that title. I would presume, therefore, that the people who address him as doctor or professor are doing nothing different in principle from addressing a medical doctor by his acquired title because it describes one of his functions in life.—Nevin W. Fisher, Elizabethtown, Pa.

More About Titles

I was glad for the article, "Brother or Professor?" by Bro Kermit Eby in Nov. 5 Messenger. Have been wishing for sometime that someone would write protesting against the prevalent use of bestowing titles in our Brotherhood.

Some years ago some brother had an article in Readers Write protesting against it. I don't remember his name but one thing he said was: Jesus gave the name brethren to his followers and how can we improve on that? I agree with him.

Then some years ago when Bro. Edward Frantz was editor of the Messenger he had an editorial along the same line. And Bro. D. W. Kurtz had an article in the Messenger speaking against bestowing of titles on so many in our fraternity. One of these brethren said, "The Presbyterians are becoming alarmed about this practice in their denomination and why should not we who profess to live the simple life?"

These degrees are bestowed, they tell us, because these men have been faithful in some line of work. Why should we not all be faithful in our work? If we have been faithful in order to receive a degree only, is not that all the reward we will get? For did not Jesus often tell the Pharisees if they performed their rites and did good deeds in order to be praised by men, they had received their reward?

It seems to me that the greatest Christian virtue taught in the New Testament is love and next to love is humility. It is the teaching of Jesus all through the gospels and the epistles of James and Peter also strongly stress humility as a great Christian virtue.

This practice of bestowing honors so profusely on its members by our church is getting away from plain gospel teaching it seems to me. If it is not done solely for honor, then for what other purpose could it be?

Which is better for our church, to have the approbation of the world or to have the favor of our Lord by following his teachings? Let us all pray for more humility.—A Sister.

Not on Order

I liked your editorial on "Watch Out for Faith Healers."

In this connection, the other night I heard John Maillard of the Episcopal Church in England speak on spiritual healing. His message was affirmative and balanced. While listening to him, I wrote the following:

Miracles do not come on order. Their time and form are not of man's deciding. They are the product and overflow of a great and total commitment. They are the fruit of the sweeping power of God—removing all uncleanness, weakness, disease before the cleansing power of his Spirit.

Sin cannot linger in God's presence. Disease does not remain where he abides. The miracle is the inflow of the power and perfection of God. In his grace he grants it, we do not command it.—W. Russell Shull, Chicago, Ill.

Worthy of Reprinting

We just read "His Kingdom in My Kitchen," by Ernestine Hoff Emrick, in the Nov. 26 issue. It is wonderful and worthy of reprinting in tract form. If you see fit to do so, let us know so we can order.—Rev. and Mrs. Waldo Kinsel, Bourbon, Ind.

All my heart this night rejoices,
As I hear, far and near,
Sweetest angel voices.
"Christ is born," their choirs are singing,
Till the air, everywhere,
Now with joy is ringing.

Come, then, let us hasten yonder;
Here let all, great and small,
Kneel in awe and wonder,
Love him who with love is yearning;
Hail the star that from far
Bright with hope is burning.

More Than a Merry Christmas

Christmas reopens the springs of genuine joy—the joy of Christ's saving light and love and power.

Ralph W. Sockman

OLD yet ever fresh, year after year, is the familiar greeting, "Merry Christmas." Life needs its times of merriment just as streams of water need their rapids to keep them pure. "Mirth is from God," declared St. Theresa, the mystic, "and dullness is from the devil." It is good at Christmas to let mirth and jollity come bubbling to the surface of our lives. But the limitations of merriment are seen if we try to interchange the traditional words of our holiday greeting and say, "A Happy Christmas and a Merry New Year." We can be merry on certain days but hardly for a year.

The first Christmas greeting was a call to joy, not to mere merriment. "I bring you good tidings of great joy which shall be to all people, for unto you is born this day in the city of David a Savior which is Christ the Lord." Joy is more than mirth. It is a vivid and animating pleasure, inspired by the perception of something which seems productive of good. It quickens the spirit, enlivens the countenance, gives radiance to the eye.

As Dean Lynn Harold Hough reminds us, "There is all the difference in the world between joy about a Savior and joy without a Savior." And he adds that "most of the cynicism of the world is the aftermath of counterfeit joys." When gaity is but the passing stimulating of an artificial mood, when it is but the lightning flash of an appetite indulged, it leaves an emptiness like that of a deserted and disarranged night club on the morning after a New Year's celebration.

But Christmas continues and grows because it reopens the springs of genuine joy. It clears away the false and formal things which fill and clog our natures and lets the simple, elemental, natural things come through. The innocence and purity of childhood, the unfathomable love of motherhood, the kindly ministries of shepherds, the humble adoration of the wise men—in these we feel again the things by which and for which we are made. Although the earth may seem old with its burden of care, at Christmas it always is young.

While many will make merry without a Savior, let us try to catch the Christmas joy about a Savior.

First of all, it is the joy of a saving light. Admiral Peary, after his long experience in the Arctic, declared that the worst menace which men had to fight was not the cold but the darkness. The long nights near the North Pole took a heavy toll of morale and health. Sunlight is essential to the health of the leaf on the tree, the skin on the body and the spirit in the man. As a boy I was often afraid in the dark. It is not hard for me to imagine what terrors the nights must have held for primitive men before they learned the laws of nature and the explanation of darkness. In their ignorance they peopled the shadows with frightening possibilities.

Hence, it is little wonder that the Old Testament spoke of the coming Redeemer in terms of light breaking into darkness. Listen to the prophet: "The people that walked in darkness have seen a great light." The citizens of Palestine lived in a dark world. They had been overrun by conquering nations. They were satellites of the Caesars in Rome. Their sick souls tossed restlessly like patients in pain waiting for the dawn and a Deliverer.

In this darkness Christ was born at Bethlehem. He was hailed as "the life which was the light of men." The birth of Christ brought a saving light to illumine the life which is in each of us, to show us that we are not mere morsels of flesh raised from the dust and doomed to rot again into it, but that we are immortal souls, children of a heavenly Father, who so loves us "that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth on him should not perish but have everlasting life."

It is therefore fitting that Christmas should be the festival of lights. The date we celebrate follows the shortest day of the year, for the coming of Christ to our spiritual climate is like the return of the sun to our northern hemisphere. Christ brings the light and warmth and meaning which turn life's winter into spring. Our world, so filled with tension, at this moment may not seem to show it, but each year more of its people feel Christ's springtime in their hearts. And that is "good tidings of great joy."

A second reason for joy is that Christ comes as saving love.

Cynics have often charged that Christmas is only a perpetuation of pre-Christian pagan festivals. It is true that in the Near East some four thousand years ago, there was observed the festival of the New Year. And the Romans in their Saturnalia bedecked their halls with green trees and brought out candles. Dr. Earl Count in his delightful book, Four Thousand Years of Christmas, traces these pre-Christian counterparts of Christmas. But in all these there was very little element of love. So in Christ there came One so magnetic that he has drawn many pagan features into the celebration of his birth, such as the yule log, the Christmas tree, the jolly figure of Saint Nicholas. Why? Because Christ answers the hunger of the human heart for love.

The manager at Bethlehem is the beautiful beginning of the world's greatest love story. The child cradled there grew up in the love of a Nazarene home. Out of love for his people he left his carpenter shop for the career of an unpaid teacher and healer. In love he lifted the broken bodies and hearts of the poor, the sick, the sinful. He loved them even to the end, for even on the cross he prayed for his persecutors. "Greater love hath no man than this that a man lay down his life for his friends." But Jesus gave his life not only for his friends, but also for his enemies, even for all the world.

Since Christ's love was revealed, the world has never been as it was before. Out of his love have grown a new reverence for womanhood, a new care for childhood, a new concern for the home, a heightened spirit of humaneness toward the suffering, a quickened conscience regarding injustice. I am well aware of the darkness of our war-shadowed world, and yet I am confident more people today are praying and working for peace and brotherhood than ever before.

Nearly sixty years ago a New York newspaper printed an edi-

Christmas Wish

ELEANORE ROOT

At Christmas, when the world is still,
I think about a wind-swept hill,
And see a cross, a suffering Man,
Dying there, to fill God's plan.

Today the world goes at a pace,
Where people seldom see his face,
Or even try to understand,
The meaning of his nail-pierced hand.

And so our wish is for good cheer,
And happiness through every year,
But most of all we humbly pray,
He'll share the path you walk each day.

The Spirit of Geneva and the Spirit of Christmas

THE SPIRIT of Geneva was born in the midst of the summit meeting last July when the leaders of four nations expressed their hope for peace and indicated their willingness to help achieve it. The success of the conference owed much to the personal initiative of President Eisenhower. The Russian leaders also were credited with a friendly spirit and good intentions. It seemed in July as if the four powers all recognized the futility of war in this atomic age and were ready to explore every other means of ending the cold war. But even in July the world was reminded that the real test of the spirit of Geneva would be the foreign ministers' conference in November.

Now many observers are saying that the spirit of Geneva is dead, that it was buried in Geneva, where it was born, by the failure of the foreign ministers to agree on any of its major topics—the reunification of Germany, disarmament or the improvement of East-West contacts.

The spirit of Christmas was born under circumstances that likely would pass unnoticed at a summit conference. There were shepherds who, having heard the good news, came to kneel down before the baby who was the hope of the world. There were mostly common people, like Mary and Joseph themselves, who could not expect to have reservations in a Bethlehem hotel; and yes, there were learned and wealthy men who came from afar to bow before the king. But the only recognition at the summit, either in Judea or in Rome, was the fearful action of Herod as he slaughtered innocent children and forced the holy family to become refugees.

There were many observers in Jerusalem who believed that the spirit of Christmas ended with a crucifixion. The lovely dream of "peace on earth, good will to men" was forever shattered, they decided, by the murderous cries of a Jewish mob and the bitter nails of a Roman cross. The glorious vision of a kingdom of righteousness and peace was lost, they thought, because this King Jesus would not permit his men to fight for him as would other kings, because he insisted that his kingdom was not of this world.

But the spirit of Christmas lives. The observers who pronounced the verdict upon Jesus' earthly ministry were wrong. He did not die. And Christmas did not die. In fact the song had just begun. The dream had just caught on with a new generation of dreamers. The kingdom they could not accept turned out to be an everlasting kingdom. Long after every summit conference —whether among the Jews in council or in Pilate's judgment hall or in Geneva—after every summit conference has broken up on the rocks of stubborn and difficult problems, the spirit of Christmas remains alive.

We are in favor of friendly handshakes, smiles and every gesture of conciliation that was made in Geneva. We are in favor of recognizing the horrible alternatives of an atomic war and acting accordingly. But neither smiles nor fears can bring us the peace for which we prayed and for which our president prayed at Geneva. The spirit of Christmas, the spirit that could not be broken by the hard assaults of hatred and violence, the spirit that could triumph even beyond the cross—this is the spirit our troubled world needs.—K. What Shall It Profit?

A SPECIAL medal, please, for Mrs. August Jueneman of Rexford, Kansas. This excellent lady was a contestant on a television quiz program. She was invited at the end of the contest to return to the same program the next week and double her winnings without any risk of losing what she had gained. Every other contestant would have gladly complied. But not Mrs. Jueneman. She could not return because, she said, "I have to sing in my church choir."

The producer of the program suggested several alternatives. Could her daughter substitute? No, her daughter played the organ for the choir. Could her husband come? No, he was the leader of the choir. To the great consternation of the television audience, a lone woman insisted that some things are of more value than money—even the easy money on giveaway TV programs.

Perhaps the millions who eagerly watch to see who will answer the $64,000 question or name that tune or stop the music or reign as queen for a day are disappointed in Mrs. Jueneman. Doesn't everyone dream of reaching the jackpot or driving home in a Cadillac as a consolation prize? No, not quite everyone. Thanks to Mrs. Jueneman, we are reminded that there are responsibilities greater than gaining money, that there are still persons who believe in working for what they receive, and that there is little profit in gaining the jackpot if you risk losing your soul.—K.M.

WHAT BETHLEHEM MEANS TO ME

Ellis G. Guthrie

IT WAS a night like many others in that small out-of-the-way place in Palestine. Yet it was a night calculated to change the course of nations and a night that changed my life and brought peace to my soul before I knew that I had a soul—before I knew anything.

The inhabitants of Bethlehem were unaware of the events taking place within the village and would not have cared had they known. The birth of a baby brings no excitement save in the household to which he comes. Of course, if a prince or a king is born the whole nation is interested. But who was interested in a baby born to peasants in a cow shed? Yet with the birth of that baby the chance of life was given to my soul before my soul was.

The prophets knew of the greater worth of this baby—precious as all babies are. Micah wrote (5:2): "But thou, Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall he come forth unto me that is to be ruler in Israel; . . ."

But very few were really aware of the significance of Bethlehem. Among those who were aware were the wise men. Their trip was hard and long; yet they made the trip gladly and eagerly to worship the little King.

And the shepherds came. Humble men were they. Yet it pleased God to reveal unto them by the angels' song the greatest event of the ages. May I receive this good news as humbly and as gratefully. Bethlehem means this to me—and more. "For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Savior, which is Christ the Lord."

Here took place the greatest of all mysteries. God became man. The unlimited became limited. The royalty of heaven became the commonplace of earth. "And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us . . ." (John 1:4a).

I do not understand the incarnation—this miracle of Bethlehem—but I have felt its power in my life. For I who am common and of little worth of myself, have changed. I have been uplifted, cleansed. I, who was born of humble parents, poor from my birth on, have been made a king and a priest unto God forever.

I cannot understand this mystery of Bethlehem. I do not know how the birth of a little babe could do this for me. I only know that it has. Nor do I know why it happened when and where it did. I only know that ". . . when the fullness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons." (Gal. 4:4-5).

Only God could see the course of events to follow. Mary and Joseph took the baby Jesus to Egypt. When they returned to Nazareth of Galilee the stories of Bethlehem had faded. No longer did the angels sing their song to earth. The wise men had returned to their distant homes.

Outside of a short look into Jesus' life at twelve, history has no other windows into his boyhood or early manhood. He ended the boyish phase of his life and took the responsibilities of a man. He did hard work in the carpenter shop. When the time of preparation and waiting was over, he left the carpenter shop. He received baptism from John in Jordan and underwent temptation in the wilderness. Then he chose his disciples that the message of salvation might be preserved for even me. Though few foresaw these things they were all implied that night in the city of David. Bethlehem means this to me—and more.

Then came his meritorious career — brilliant, beautiful — and, like a meteor flashing across the skies, it was soon eclipsed by the darkness of sin. It started with the turning of water into wine. Other miracles followed. The words that he spoke were miracles. They gave hope and life. They touched heartstrings never before played upon. At a word the dumb spoke; the deaf heard. With the touch of His hand the blind saw and the sick were made whole. He spoke with the Father and the dead were restored to life. Of him God said: "This is my beloved Son: hear him" (Luke 9:35b).

Life is full of pain and trouble. And Jesus found life no different from the way we find it. His good and pure life ran into the evil and pride of men. They opposed him; they made plans to destroy him.

It was this that drove Jesus to the Garden of Gethsemane and led him to the cross. In the Garden he fought his battle alone with his God. His inner torture was so great that he sweat great drops of blood. The question in his mind was simply this: Should he die or should I? Should he take upon himself my sins or let me bear them myself. But he knew that I could not. He wanted some other solution so he cried out: "O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me: nevertheless not as I will, but as thou wilt" (Matt. 26:39b).

There was no other way. And because Christ loved even me he was willing to drink the cup, to bear my sin and shame. After Gethsemane Jesus endured the mockery of a trial. Once his mind was set there was no turning back. He set his eyes beyond the cross to the glory that would belong to him—and to me—because he was to die on that cross.

How could this come out of Bethlehem? Calvary is part of the story, the same as are the wise men or the shepherds. Bethlehem was the beginning of what Calvary was to be the end.

That death on the cross gave me life and hope. Unworthy as I am to stoop and touch his feet, he purchased my pardon in that hour. This is the greatest of all miracles. Bethlehem means this to me—and more. For the story does not end on the cross but in an empty tomb.

The chapters of this great drama have all been written save the concluding ones. Those will tell of his coming again when we shall crown him King. Then we shall sing the songs of Moses and of the Lamb without ceasing.

This then is what Bethlehem means to me. This is what I see when I hear the old familiar

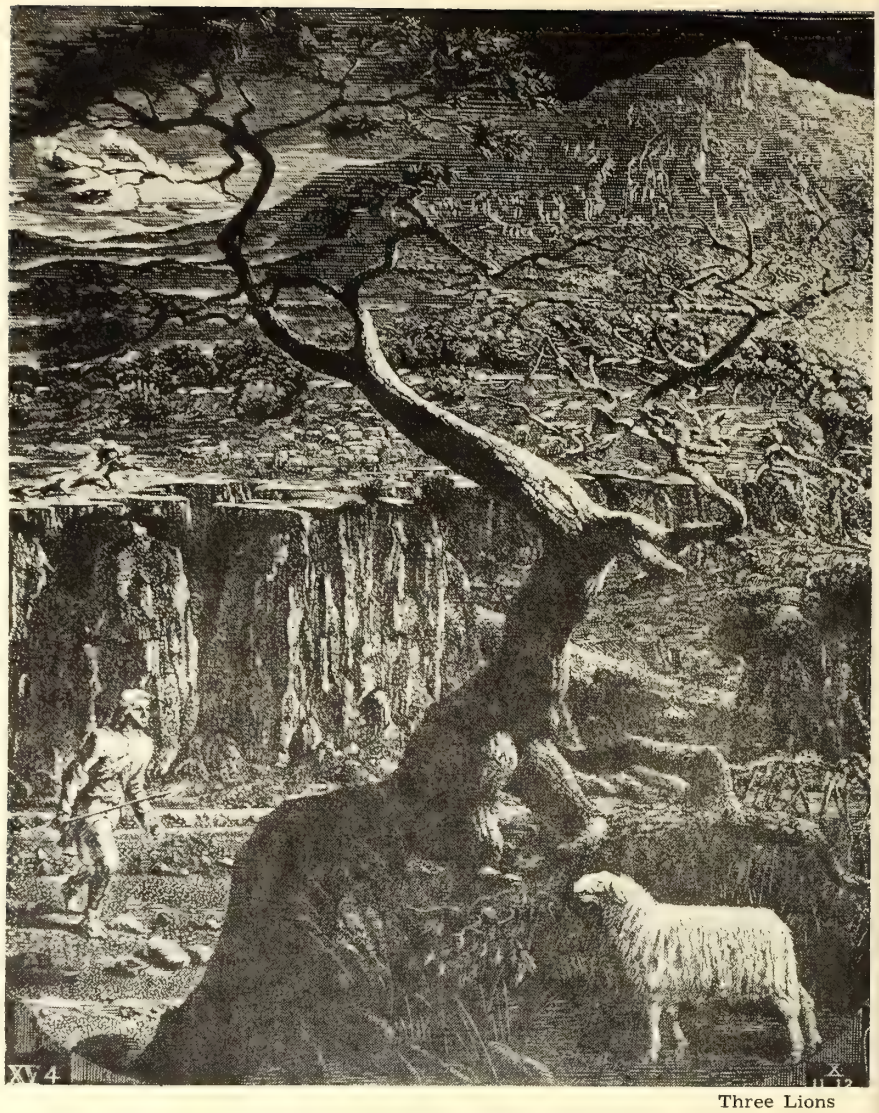
NATIVITY

EDWARD K. ZIEGLER

Born in a stable 'mid oxen and sheep,
Mother love warmed him in manger asleep;
Jesus our Savior, God's own baby boy
Lay smiling while archangels chorused their joy.



Above him the star shone so silent and bright,
And shepherds in wonder beheld a great light;
In reverence and worship they came where he lay,
Then knelt by the manger, their heads bowed to pray.

In stately rich splendor wise men from afar
Brought three priceless treasures, as led by a star,
They came from old Egypt, from Hind and Iran
To offer their gifts to the Savior of man.

Now what can I offer, O Lord of my heart?
For all of my treasure, and all the world's art
Are tinsel and playthings, scarce worthy for thee;
Oh, be born in my heart! Be incarnate in me!

WHY JESUS?

G. Wayne Glick

Three Lions

Like the shepherd who seeks the lost sheep, God seeks the sinner, that through Christ he might reconcile and redeem him

WHAT is unique and necessary about Jesus? Why should not we depend upon the revelation of God which we find in nature or in the achievements of men who have come close to God? These are important questions, touching the whole relation of the Christian to the world in which he lives. In a sense the one who asks these questions is forcing himself to go to the very root of his faith. If faith is fidelity—following—rather than mere assent, then it requires of us more than "taking certain things for granted." We need to be able to give a reason why Jesus Christ is held to be unique and necessary, leading us beyond nature or the heroes of history.

The first thing that we need to recognize is that this is very often a pressing personal problem to the one who asks the question. It is no use to trot out our theological vocabulary and confuse the issue with incomprehensible terms. Nor is it enough simply to blast the questioners with a "You don't have faith." The gospel has never been simply a set of theological propositions, no matter how valid the theologian's task may be. Nor has the gospel proclamation proceeded along its two thousand year course by dodging the hard questions with pat answers, signifying nothing.

The question is there, in the minds of many and sometimes on their lips. It is a question which a St. Paul would have welcomed and he would have given a reason for the faith that was in him. And so must we. We cannot say, "I believe in Jesus because Paul did or because my fathers did or because my preacher said it was the way to get to heaven." We must allow the question its full rights; why, after all, this man? Why Jesus?

We need also to recognize that this is a life and death question for the Christian church. If we cannot answer this question with the conviction that springs from the very depths of our being, we had better admit it and put our energies elsewhere. William Beahm used to remind his students at Bethany of the truth of the fact that "the Christian church is always just one generation from extinction." This is our question and on our answer depends the continued life of the institution we call the church.

Teacher in the department of religion, Franklin and Marshall College, Lancaster, Pennsylvania

Why not depend upon the revelation of God which we find in nature? Let us notice that this question implies an important truth: that there is a revelation of God in nature. Or, perhaps more carefully put, there is a revelation of God through nature. The Bible is clear on this point, in both the Old and the New Testaments. Genesis declares that God made the world. Paul, in his sermon to the Athenians, repeats this fundamental truth. Later, writing to the Romans, Paul makes this divine creation the basis for holding men accountable: "For what can be known about God is plain to them, because God has shown it to them. Ever since the creation of the world his invisible nature, namely, his eternal power and deity, has been clearly perceived in the things that have been made. So they are without excuse . . ." (Rom. 1:19-20).

But what have men done with respect to this good creation, declaring the glory of God? "Although they knew God they did not honor him as God or give thanks to him". . . . but "they exchanged the truth about God for a lie and worshiped and served the creature rather than the Creator" (1:21 and 25). So we ought to know God through his creation, but we become idolatrous and worship all sorts of cunningly devised substitutes. But God is not mocked; all that we accomplish thereby is to dishonor ourselves.

One of the key words in the above question is the word nature. When we use it we do not mean simply the trees and flowers and mountains and brooks. We mean everything that has been created, including man himself, who is a part of nature. As the grass dies, so man dies; his finiteness is written in him. This we must recognize, though we shall see later that there is more to man (according to Christian faith) than this. But he is a part of nature.

Now the distinctive thing about "nature" in this sense is that it is under the law of necessity. This means simply that anything natural just has to be what it is. A rock cannot exercise freedom and become a tree; it cannot even become a "bigger and better" rock. A sunset, no matter how beautiful, is still a dead, dumb thing; it does not know or care that it is what we call beautiful. We may then admire it as a beautiful, created thing; but we will not worship it as though it were good in itself. Its beauty points us beyond itself to the God who made it. And when we see God through it, rather than in it, we can rejoice that we have eyes to see and minds to know that it is a part of the good creation of a loving Father.

There is a revelation of God through nature and the insensitive person who cannot see it deserves pity. But were this the only revelation of God possible for us, how miserable we should be! To see beauty and power and order, to understand all mysteries about the creation and still to have no warrant of a loving God would leave us saying with the Preacher, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity."

Why not depend upon the revelation of God which we find in the great achievements of men who have lived close to God? This question, too, implies that God has revealed himself through humankind. Again, we have Biblical warrant: "So God created man in his own image . . ." (Gen. 1:27), and "Thou hast made him little less than God and dost crown him with glory and honor" (Psa. 8:5). There has, obviously, been given to man something that sets him apart from the rest of created nature. What this "something" is has been debated loud and long, but whatever else it is, it involves what we call freedom. A rock cannot be a bad rock or a good rock; it has no freedom, for it is all a part of nature. But a man can be a good man or a bad man, for a man has freedom, a freedom not entirely bound by nature.

When we say freedom here we mean that moral and religious capacity which can be exercised for the good or for the bad, for the service of God or for the

While the Heavens With Melody Rang

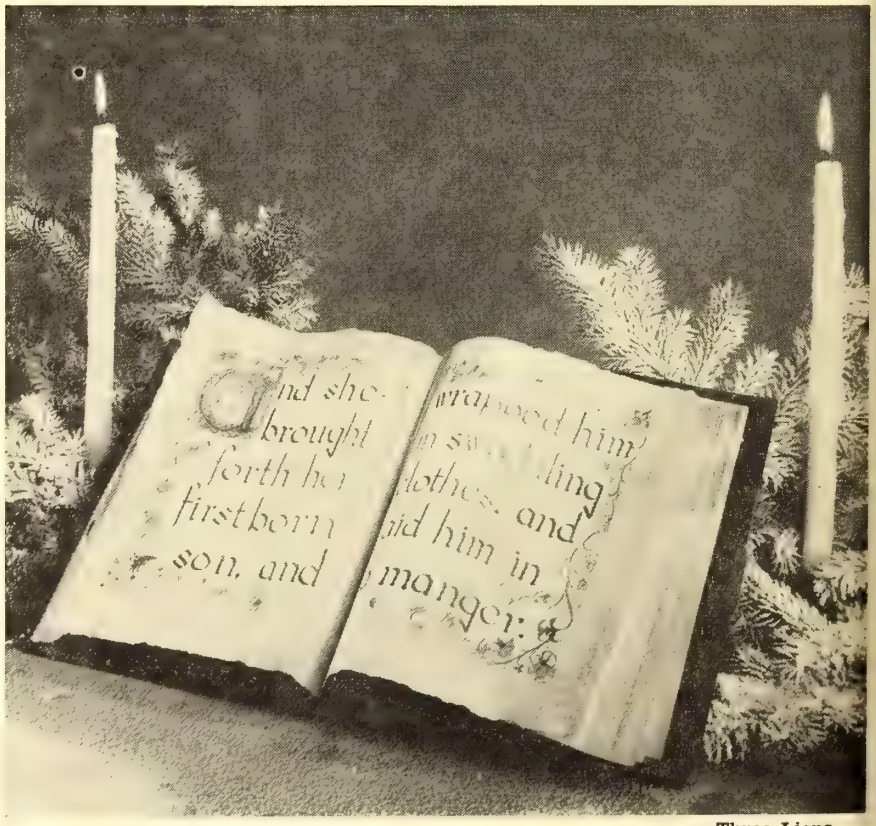
MARY STONER WINE

I should like to have heard the glad tidings that night
When the glory of God shone with radiant light
And the heavens with melody rang.
I should like to have worshiped at that manger bed
To have knelt where the cattle and oxen fed
While the heavens with melody rang.
But to God's chosen few came the message of love
When the Savior came down from his palace above
And the heavens with melody rang.
But again in his plan there shall come a glad day
When the harpers of God in great triumph shall play
Till the heavens with melody ring.
Then the saints of all ages who've followed his star,
The redeemed and victorious shall come from afar
While the heavens with melody sing.
When the ransomed in glory shall sing a new song
We'll hear the great music and join with the throng
Till the heavens with melody ring.

exploitation of God and man. This is a man, one who can say, "for the greater glory of God," and thus live a different life, committed to the One who created him or, on the other hand, one who can exercise that freedom to become a tyrant or a near-beast.

We have said, then, that nature is bound by necessity and that man has been given freedom. Using that freedom, man makes history: first, a little personal history, growing out of countless choices and decisions; then, perhaps, he enters into a broader area of influence and may help to change the destiny of communities or even nations; and some, whom the world calls great, may take their places as the shapers of whole civilizations. Buddhism's founder, Gautama, was such a great one; so was Mohammed and Lao-tze and Confucius and Abraham and Moses and Jesus. On this level, the level of influence on the world, it must be said of all of them that they were "great men."

In our own day, on a lesser scale, perhaps, there have been men like Ghandi, and Schweitzer and the particular heroes of all sorts of modern "movements." Why, we ask, should we not depend upon the revelation of God which comes through any of these men, without singling out Jesus?



Let us not be so arrogant that we say that no revelation can come through God-dedicated human souls. God moves in mysterious ways and it would seem clear from history that many times the pretensions of "Christians" have been checked by those outside of Christianity. Who would care to defend the medieval inquisitions of the church, which were checked only by the rise of nations? Or who would seriously defend the position that the church took at the time of the rise of science, fighting every new discovery as though God depended on them, rather than they on him? And this list could be indefinitely prolonged.

No, we are not God, and when we pretend to be, he may have to judge us with an "Assyrian whip." Where there is honest devotion to God, and great achievements because of it, let us remember that God will judge and be grateful for the increase of human good.

But do we thereby need to say that every religion is therefore as good as every other? You prefer Mohammed, I prefer Christ —well, well, it is just a matter of preference! This would seem to be the argument of some. Every religion has a standard of ethical behavior and whatever serves to keep people "good" is therefore of equal worth to any other standard.

This, it seems to me, is a silly argument. First, it assumes that all religions teach essentially the same thing. This is not true. Secondly, it assumes that just because someone can believe something and get a thrill out of it or live a moral life because of it, that this justifies the belief. This is, from the standpoint of Christian faith, a practical atheism, suggesting that there is really nothing there as our object of trust, but only our feelings. Thirdly, and most important, it is a man-centered approach. It assumes from the beginning that we make our own gods, not that he, the Almighty Creator, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, made us and we are therefore his. God sets the rules of our game of life; we do not. Perhaps that is the reason why so much of our running is done "out-of-bounds."

Finally, this argument assumes that the "god" who is worshiped in all religions is "really" the same God whom Christians worship. This also is untrue, as any little reading in comparative religion will show. The God whom Christians worship is the God "who was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself." One of the great passages of the New Testament is the opening declaration of the unknown author of Hebrews: "In many and various ways God spoke of old to our fathers by the prophets; but in these last days he has spoken to us by a Son, whom he appointed the heir of all things, through whom also he created the world." The Omega and the Alpha—Jesus Christ: this is the rock on which the Christian stands.

What is unique and necessary about Jesus? We have been hinting at the difference, that which makes Jesus unique and necessary. Perhaps the hint has been heavily veiled, but anyone who has followed the argument thus far has seen two things: one, Jesus' uniqueness has nothing to do with the revelation of God in nature, else the Incarnation would have been a completely unnecessary thing; secondly, Jesus' uniqueness does not lie in his teaching of a new ethical code. The scholars have found every bit of Jesus' teaching in the Jewish literature, at an earlier date than that of Jesus, every bit except one. Jesus was not unique in referring to God as a heavenly Father: this also was previously used in Jewish thought. What is it then? If not in the Beatitudes or the parables, or the concept of himself as Suffering Servant Son-of-Man, where is the uniqueness? In this: for Jesus, God is a God who seeks the sinner.

Why am I a Christian? There is only one reason: because through Christ, acting for God, I am rid of my sins. Surely, this means a great deal more than what we usually think of when that statement is made: it means a restoration to sonship, the realization of that for which the world was made (no wonder that the Greeks called Christianity a scandalous thing); it means a hope that is plunged into eternity, where those who love God and are faithful servants shall live forever with him; it means that my life is no more my own, but I am bought, and therefore owned, and therefore a servant in the reconciling ministry of God to men; it means that I am a part of a fellowship of forgiven sinners, working with them, building them up, and being built up by them; it means that no man can be my enemy, for through Christ, I am debtor to all and a brother of all God's sons; it means, in life, the wrecking of every selfish dream and the surrender of every ambition, in the service of the Love that will not desert; it means eternal life, here and now in the midst

The Family Counselor welcomes letters of inquiry. They may be addressed: Family Life Department, General Brotherhood Board, 22 S. State St., Elgin, Ill.

Dear Counselor,

During the past year several children in this community met with tragic deaths by automobile. Intermingled with grief and disappointment is the feeling by the parents and many around here that these tender lives were snatched into eternity by the predetermined plan of an inscrutable design of God, and that absolutely nothing could have been done to forestall these accidents; these children were born to die young.

However, it seems to me that children were born to grow up, mature and be useful in using their God-given talents to the glory of God and man.

Concerned.

Dear Concerned,

Every tragedy evokes the question "Why?" When good people suffer or innocent children are destroyed we question the purposes of God. In that awful moment on Calvary even Jesus asked, "My God, my God, why . . .?"

There are those who declare that God permits, even authorizes, suffering and tragedy because he is stern and implacable in his righteousness. Because there is sin in the world our God is a terrible God. Evil must be paid for in kind and in amount. If God does not exact propitiation for sin he is not God. Epidemics, heart-rending experiences, untimely deaths of children and many other unexplainable tragedies in life are spoken of ominously in the creeds as proceeding from "the inscrutable decrees of an all wise providence." So runs the doctrine of a God whose wrath is equal to his love.

Once life did not involve suffering. Bread was not earned by the sweat of the brow. Life was added unto life without the march down into the deep valley of the shadow of death. Disaster was unknown and life was entirely without tragedy. But something happened and, as St. Paul says, "sin entered into the world and death [entered] by sin, and so death passed unto all men, for all have sinned." Paul states positively that all suffering is the result of sin.

Jesus confirms this word of Paul, with one modifying idea. Jesus teaches that all suffering is indirectly the result of sin in the human family. When his disciples asked of the man who was born blind, "Who sinned, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?" Jesus said, "Neither, but for the purposes of God he is so." All suffering and tragedy have some part in the plan of God, but Jesus insists we have no right to conclude that any certain affliction is the direct result of any given wrongdoing. Suffering is the indirect result of sin.

Likewise, we learn from Jesus that the intention and purpose of God is that life shall be good for all men. The will of God is a good will. Life is not imprisoned in a fatalism of inevitable misfortune, but it is a living experience in which the issues of existence are determined by divine plan and intervention, by the effective working of God and man.

It is the Christian responsibility that each of us do all we can to free life from tragedy and disaster, to work with God who seeks an abundant life for all and to rear our children in the forward-looking family pattern of Jesus "who increased in wisdom and stature and in favor with God and man."

of time, and forever and ever beyond time. It means redemption.

I do not find this in ethical codes. No Confucian "silver rule," however laudable as a goal, can "make my sins as though they were not." No "great man" can forgive me, though those who have been forgiven can show me what true character is, because the motive of action has been purified in the fire of the Holy Ghost. Am I the kind of person who can be satisfied with noble actions? I cannot honestly answer "Yes." Am I the kind of person who, being forgiven, finds the Beatitudes to be the fruit of that forgiveness? I must answer "Yes." But I know that "as I am," sin prevails, and I find that others, the great men of Christian history, have said the same. And then I see them, forgiven at the cross, and "great things" happen. "God who seeks the sinner"—the uniqueness, the unqualified necessity of Jesus—has moved in the mystery of his majesty and love and life begins, real life.

Why Jesus? For the one convinced, converted and committed, it is not a question but a declaration—God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself. We probably shall always find it difficult, being human and limited, to comunicate this good news as we feel we should; the very words that we use strain and crack under the impact of the message no words can bear.

God has made him both Lord and Christ, this Jesus who was crucified. Therefore, we say with Augustine: "Walk by him the man and thou comest to God. By him thou goest, to him thou goest. Look not for any way except himself by which to come to him. For if he had not vouchsafed to be the way we should all have gone astray. Therefore, he became the way by which thou shouldest come. I do not say to thee, seek the way. The way itself is come to thee: arise and walk." torial written to answer a little eight-year-old girl who had sent in a letter saying that some of her friends said there was no Santa Claus. Listen to the editor's answer: "Virginia, your little friends are wrong. They have been affected by the skepticism of a skeptical age. They do not believe except what they see. . . . All minds, Virginia, whether they be men's or children's, are little . . . as measured by the intelligence capable of grasping the whole truth, Yes, Virginia, there is a Santa Claus. He exists as certainly as love and generosity and devotion exist, and you know that they abound and give to your life its highest beauty and joy. . . . The most real things in this world are those that neither children nor men can see. . . . Only faith, fancy, poetry, love, romance can push aside that curtain and view and picture the supernal beauty and glory beyond. Is it all real? Ah, Virginia, in all this world there is nothing else real and abiding."

That editor's answer has been called the most famous editorial in newspaper history. In these dark times we talk much about being realistic. We usually mean that we must take the darkest possible view of our dangers and our surroundings. I, too, want to be realistic. I do not want to be fooled by wishful thinking. But we can be deceived by foolish fears as well as by futile hopes.

So Christmas, with its sequel through the centuries, convinces me that love is more lastingly real than our present hatreds, just as the sunshine is more lastingly real than the clouds.

A Joy Forever

Kirby Page

A THING of beauty is a joy
Forever, sang the poet.
A beautiful, breathing
Instrument of music, the Lord
Made man, whereon the spirit
Of life makes melody to God,
Exclaimed the saint. Like
Aspen leaves in the breeze,
Man is stirred by beauty:
The purity of a white rose,
The exquisite grace of a Hummingbird, the autumn
Glory of a maple grove,
The flash of a rainbow
Trout in a mountain stream,
An orange tree in full
Blossom and with golden
Fruit, a range of hills
Across the desert, the Incoming tide at midnight,
The Taj Mahal, the ruins
Of the Parthenon, the Lincoln Memorial, the Sistine Madonna, Mona Lisa,
The Empire State building,
Niagara Falls, a snow
Crystal, the face of a Loved one, the smile of
A sleeping baby.
Beauty possessed me; I could Not speak aloud, was the Experience of the artist. To
The pinnacle of exaltation
Is the human spirit lifted
By loveliness and harmony,
Purity and goodness, truth
And duty, When thus Enraptured, man beholds a
New heaven and a new earth;
Old things have passed
Away and all things are new.
Such is the power of an Idea, the pull of an ideal,
The wonder of personality,
The warmth of friendship,
The fervor of affection,
The appeal of our Lord,
The summons of the Almighty.
Man's very being may be Shaken by penitence, melted
By gratitude, ribbed as Steel by determination. The Human soul is not confined
To one spot or to a Single instant. It roams
The past and the future,
And enables one to dwell
Today in the city of God.

Therefore, I rejoice with those who first heard the "good tidings of great joy" for the Savior born in the city of David brought a saving love.

And the Savior's light and love have proved also to be a saving power. The Christmas story contains an interesting study in contrasted powers. Joseph and Mary went up to Bethlehem because of a decree sent out by Caesar Augustus that all the empire should be taxed. Caesar Augustus—what a name to ponder! The mightiest monarch the world had seen up to that time. On his words the whole world waited. What did Caesar Augustus know or care about the poor carpenter's wife and her babe in the little town of Bethlehem? And in the Christmas scene is another powerful figure, Herod, called "the Great." He had heard rumors that a rival might arise from among the Jewish people. He would risk no such danger. He bade the wise men bring him word if they found such a possibility. How helpless looked that Babe in the manger under the shadow of Herod's murderous intent!

A few years later in the reign of Caesar's successor, Jesus died on a cross. But the lowly manger of his birth and the ignominious cross of his death did not stop the Christ from outliving Herod and Caesar. Today they would scarcely be remembered except for their connection with the Christmas story. Just as the root of a growing tree can crack the solid pavement, so the divine life which was in the Bethlehem Babe has cracked the crowns of kings and despots down the centuries.

Yet the supreme power of the One born in Bethlehem is that he saves people from their sins. That is why they called his name Jesus. That is the power above all others which our world so desperately needs today. And that is the reason above all others why Christmas to the Christian is more than merry. It brings the "good tidings of great joy that unto you is born this day in the city of David a Savior which is Christ the Lord."

As all of us rejoice once again in the joy and gladness of Bethlehem, may the spirit of Christ be born in us anew, teaching our love to remember, our anger to forgive, our unkindness to forget. May that spirit make cheerful our homes that little children may laugh and parents rejoice and the aged be happy. May it spread abroad goodwill so that hard hearts may be softened, fears may be lessened and hopes may be lifted. May the joy of Christmas so fill us with compassion for our fellow men that we shall find new ways to brotherhood and peace on earth.

story of a stable where a tired man and his young wife watch a little babe as he coos upon the hay.

All that Bethlehem means to me it can mean to you. I am convinced that if you were the only person outside the love of God this whole story would still have taken place that you might have life and have it more abundantly.

Reviews of Recent Books

Books are reviewed here as a service to the church. A review does not necessarily constitute an unqualified recommendation. Purchase can be made through the Brethren Publishing House, Elgin, Illinois. Titles recommended for church libraries are marked with an asterisk (*).—Editor.

What's It all About? Goodrich. Revell, 1955. 92 pages. $2.50.

This is a book of sermons, by Robert E. Goodrich, Jr., dealing with essential questions that people ask about God and life. Answers to great questions are given in a sparkling but helpful way. The sermons are evidence that the preacher of them intimately knows people and the turmoil they endure. While one could wish for a greater amount of Biblical content, the sermons represent clear thinking consistent with good Biblical understanding. Probably the best recommendation for the book is that when reading the sermons one wishes that he could have heard them preached.—Stewart B. Kauffman.

On Call for Youth. Wittenberg. Association Press, 1955. 241 pages. $3.50.

As a parent, teacher, youth leader or a minister, what do you say and how do you interpret a teenager when he says, "I'm no good," "I don't care," or "I'm in love," "I want to be left alone"? On Call for Youth is one of the best books that has been written to help you counsel with young people. The author has taken his previous, popular books (So You Want to Help People and The Art of Group Discipline) and has put them into one designed for counseling youth.

This is written for the "average" youth who does not get our attention as frequently as the delinquent but whose individuality needs to be discovered and strengthened, too. Rudolph Wittenberg gives us twenty years' experience, an up-to-date procedure, and help in counseling youth.—Ed Crill.

Daystar. Amelia Elizabeth Walden. Westminster, 1955. 188 pages. $2.75.

A novel exposing social and class prejudice between two young people destined to break through the barrier. This is a story of an ordinary town with all of its everyday life and it is a story showing the problems of youth as they attempt to cross the lines of prejudice. It goes to the very heart of prejudice showing the things that divide us. Good for teenagers. — Margaret Huston, Chicago, Ill.

HENTZ of Things Not Seen. Harriet H. House. MacMillan, 1955. 256 pages. $3.50.

The story of the faith and courage developed in individuals after experiencing unusual discouragement through an accident to a son in the family. After about two years the son dies but the influence of his life on others during those two last years was perhaps greater than if he had lived under normal circumstances for the usual length of time. To individuals, discouraged because of physical suffering, the message in this book should help them regain courage and faith.—R. Slaubaugh.

Christmas Symbols and Customs

Eloise Barnhart

THE symbols which we choose to place in our homes at Christmas can emphasize the true meaning of Christmas. The Christmas tree, yule log, candles and all the other customs can be used to help us remember that Christmas is the birthday of the Christ. Knowing how some of these symbols evolved through the centuries may help us to celebrate Christmas in a deep, inspiring, joyous way.

Many of our customs had their beginning in paganism but they were incorporated by the church and given Christian names and inspiration. The word Christmas is as distinctly English as Wehrnacht is German and Noel is French. It came into use in the 12th century, no doubt because of the custom of celebrating mass at midnight on Christmas Eve, the only time this was done.

Many of the customs associated with yule log have disappeared. The log was kept smoldering during the twelve days of Christmas so it could be blown into flame when the occasion demanded. Many ceremonies were associated with securing the log, its kind and its disposal. Although we no longer burn a yule log we use the symbol in our decorations. It is a symbol of the warm emotion and bright thoughts of the season.

Candles came later than the glowing fire. The custom of placing candles in windows had its beginning in the Irish custom of placing a light in the window to light the Christ Child's way if he should be outside alone in the cold. In Norway the people burned candles to signify Christ as the light of the world. Martin Luther used candles on his Christmas tree to represent the stars shining through the evergreen forest in Christmas Eve. In central Europe, Germany especially, four candles, two red and two white are placed in the Advent wreath. One candle is lighted before the evening meal on the first of the four Sundays before Christmas. This candle is extinguished after the meal. The second Sunday two candles are lighted, the third Sunday three candles, and on the fourth Sunday all four candles are lighted.

Candles in wreaths are very familiar in our decorations or wreaths alone which are in honor of St. Stephen, the first deacon, whose Greek name means wreath. A modern wreath that has won much popularity is the Della Robbia wreath, a living replica of the artist's Bambino medallions. Mrs. Margaret Fowler was so impressed with the Bambinos in Italy, she suggested to the members of the Boys' Republic of Chino, California, that they try to make some such wreaths. Since 1932 the boys have gathered the year around various leaves, seed pods, cones, etc., which they later combine with colorful fruits. Anne Wertsner in her book, Make Your Own Merry Christmas, gives instructions for making these wreaths. Their making can become a family project.

The use of evergreens at Christmas was contributed by paganism. At first, the church disapproved of their use, especially in the church, because of the superstitions surrounding them. But Scripture justification may be found in "The Glory of Lebanon shall come into thee, the fir tree, the pine tree, and box together, to beautify the place of my sanctuary" (Isa. 60:13). The church gave new meaning to the plants, holly, ivy, mistletoe, and rosemary. The holly with its red berries among the sharp green leaves speak of the blood drops which the crown of thorns drew from the Savior's brow. Ivy became related to the madonna and child. Romans considered mistletoe a symbol of hope and peace. When enemies met under it they kissed each other and called a truce. At one time a bough was placed on the altar to proclaim a pardon to all. The herb, rosemary, is said to receive its lovely fragrance from the fact that Mary laid the Christ Child's garments on it. Rosemary ceased to be a part of Christmas in victorious times.

To Mexico we owe the poinsettia, where it is called Flor de la Noche Buena, Flower of the Holy Night, or Christmas Eve. Dr. Joel Poinsett, minister to Mexico, in 1828 sent the first wild plants with their tiny yelow flowers to Robert Buist, a nurseyman in Philadelphia, who named it Euphorbie poinsettia. Later it was given the Poinsettia Pulcherrima. Of course, it is usually just called Poinsettia. In the South and in some parts of California plants grow as tall as small buildings. Albert Ecke, a Swiss farmer near Los Angeles, developed the plant as we know it. His son, Paul, has made Encinitos, California, the poinsettia capital of the world.

The Christmas tree as we have it is almost entirely the creation of Christian thought and sentiment. On the night Christ was born it was thought the trees blossomed and bore fruit. In Europe it became the custom to cut boughs of hawthorn and cherry trees to bring them inside and place them in a warm place so they would bloom by Christmas. If we remember that the buds of the flowering trees are formed in the fall and three or four weeks of warmth is all that is required to bring the buds into bloom this lovely custom might be revived today.

Martin Luther is credited with decorating the first Christmas tree in Germany. Prince Albert brought the decorated tree to England. About 1850 Pastor Schawn in Cleveland placed a tree in his church. The people were shocked, for this was the first tree they had seen. Pastor Schawn looked about the country for this custom; finally he found a German boy in Wooster, Ohio, who had had such a tree. A letter recently tells of a German professor at Harvard who had a tree in 1832. In China the Christmas tree is called the tree of life.

Sometimes in the rush of Christmas we forget the significance of our gifts. Through the ages people have given to their loved ones and others on Christ's birthday, in his honor and in remembrance of the wise men, the first gift bearers. In some Eastern countries today gifts are given to the children on Epiphany, January 6, the day that commemorates the coming of the Magi. In Spain children set out their shoes at the second-story windows or balcony so the King of the East, their Santa Claus, will leave gifts as he rides by on his camel. In Italy, on the eve of the Feast of the Three Kings, an old woman, Befona, with a witchlike appearance brings gifts to the children. In Poland a beautiful woman dressed in a flowing white robe brings gifts direct from the stars, they say.

In some parts of Alaska the children look to the Good Star for their gifts. In Cuba the Three Kings, one white, one yellow and one black, each bring gifts to the children of his race. These kings come on January 6 and the gifts are left at the foot of the children's bed. In Mexico the children receive their gifts at Epiphany. St. Nicholas, Bishop of Myra, in Asia Minor at the beginning of the fourth century gave gifts to his people secretly, particularly the poor. On his death, December 6, in Austria, Hungary, Rumania, Flanders and Holland St. Nicholas Eve is to the children of those lands what Christmas Eve is to American children. The Hollanders changed St. Nicholas to Santa Claus and Dutch settlers brought him to America.

In Sweden the julklapp, a small precious package wrapped in an enormous package is brought to the door by someone, who after knocking, hurries away before his identity is known. Also in Sweden as father distributes the gifts the original rhymes attached to each gift is read aloud. In Italy an urn of fate filled with wrapped gifts is passed from mother to other members of the family. If anyone gets the gift with his name on it he keeps the gift otherwise he puts the gift back and tries again. I mention these customs because here the gifts are not all important but the family fellowship.

Bells have always had a place in the Christmas holidays even through the Reformation. About 400 A.D. in Italy a bell was used on a church to call the worshipers to mass. The use spread to France and England. Because of the early association with churches bells soon became a sacred thing. We use bells for decorations, cards and in poems such as Longfellow's poem, with its message of peace, Christmas Bells.

Our manger scene began with St. Francis of Assisi who arranged the scene to make the Christmas story more easily understood by the peasants. In Spain it is called Nacimiento; in France, Crech; in Germany, the Krippe. In Italy it is called Presepe (stable). On Christmas Eve the family eats supper around it. The manger is empty. On Christmas morning the mother with ceremony places the Bambino in his bed. During the week Italians enjoy visiting their friends and viewing their scenes. Around Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, a community Putz, or nativity scene, has been a Moravian tradition for over 200 years and in nearly every home is found a smaller Putz made by the family.

For centuries men have revered the stars as God's handiwork. Christ's coming is foretold in Numbers 24:17: "There shall come a Star out of Jacob." In Matt. 2:9, we read ". . . lo, the star, which they saw in the East, went before them, till it came and stood over where the young child was." We find lighted stars in our churches and in our homes, stars at the top of the Christmas tree or in the window; cookies are baked in the shape of stars. Stars add meaning and beauty to Christmas cards and wrappings.

It is time for Christians to examine their Christmas traditions and customs; to discard those which do not enrich our spirits and keep those that remind us of God's gift to us.

A major objective of America's schools should be to develop "ethical behavior based on a sense of moral and spiritual values," the White House Conference on Education declared in a report on educational objectives adopted by a plenary session of more than 2,000 delegates. The report urged, among other fundamental objectives, development of "respect and appreciation for human values and for the beliefs of others."

The German Kirchentag, the great annual gathering of German Protestants, will be held at Frankfurt, Germany, Aug. 8-12, 1956. Those who are contemplating a trip to Europe next summer may want to include in their plans this meeting to which hundreds of thousands of church people come yearly. Information about the Kirchentag can be secured from Dr. Franklin H. Littell, Uhlandstrasse 11, Bad Godesberg, Germany.

Handel's The Messiah was presented simultaneously by some 2,000 singers in 65 diffeernt locations in southern California and Nevada to herald the opening of the Christmas season. Sponsored by the Los Angeles Church Federation and the Southern California Council of Protestant Churches, the project enlisted five hundred churches, the most widespread performance of the oratorio since is was written in 1741. The director is Dr. Gordon Bachlund, who became blind in 1950.

It is estimated that there are nearly 350,000 literate Christians in India, Pakistan and Ceylon who do not possess their own Bible. The Bible Society of India, Pakistan and Ceylon is making a survey trying to check these figures and to discover whether the reason for this is poverty or indifference. While is will be difficult for the society to reduce its present selling price for scriptures, that generally covers about half the actual cost of production, they are eager to meet this particular situation.

Theological problems involved in Christian unity will be explored at a conference to be held on the campus of Oberlin College, Ohio, in September 1957. The theme of the conference will be The Nature of the Unity We Seek. The first meeting of its kind, it will be sponsored by the United States Conference for the World Council of Churches and the Canadian Council of Churches. The sessions are expected to bring together some 400 persons from denominations and 100 "Faith and Order" consultants.

The General Board of the National Council of Churches at its recent meeting adopted a resolution urging churches to aid five Southern ministers ousted from their pulpits over the race segregation issue. The Council also directed Church World Service to seek ways to establish a relief program for victims of persecution as a result for their efforts on behalf of justice and asked all government agencies to resist temptation to allow possible partisan political advantage to inhibit them from the maintenance of human rights and the furtherance of justice.

Sebring church, Fla., has scheduled its annual Bible conference to begin Sunday morning, Jan. 29; it will continue through the next Sunday. The speaker will be Bro. Linford Rotenberger.

Bridgewater College

The campaign to raise funds for a new health and physical education building is progressing with confidence. Approximately $135,000 in cash and pledges has been received. In the meantime a new factor has come into the picture when a recent independent engineer's inspection declared the present forty-seven-year old structure unsafe for varsity intercollegiate basketball games. Thus, the home schedule for this season is being staged at near-by high school gymnasiums.

The death of W. E. Wine of Berryville and formerly of Toledo, Ohio, occurred in early November. Mr. Wine, an alumnus of 1901, had served on the trustee board for the past four years. He was a leading benefactor of the college in his life time. Mr. Wine invented and had patented more than 250 inventions, mostly in the field of railroad appliances. At the time of his death he was chairman of the board of the Wine Railway Equipment Company and the Unitcast Corporation, Toledo manufacturing firms.

Co-operating with the Southeastern regional office, the college library has been officially designated by the college administration as a repository for historical materials concerning the Church of the Brethren in the area. Possession of Alexander Mack's personal Bible, the Sunday-school cards printed by the Sower Press and used by the mother church at Germantown, and the several Sower Bibles, including the Reuel Pritchett collection, are of special value as Brethren items now held by the college.

Bob Richards, world's record pole vaulter and decathlon winner, will return to his alma mater on Jan. 9-13 to lead a religious emphasis week on the campus.

The annual spiritual life institute for pastors and laymen is scheduled for Feb. 7-9. Leaders include Dr. Halford Luccock, professor emeritus of Yale Divinity School; Bro. Paul M. Robinson, moderator of the Church of the Brethren; Dr. Paul Petcher, medical missionary to Africa; Bro. Edward K. Ziegler and Bro. Frank Williar, pastors at Roanoke and Baltimore, respectively.

Paul H. Bowman's eagerly awaited book, History of Brethren Education in the Southeast, is expected to come from the press within a few months. Bro. Bowman, for twenty-seven years president of Bridgewater and four times moderator of the Church of the Brethren, has been praised by the manuscript readers for writing a scholarly, readable and original interpretation of a phase of Brethren history that will have Brotherhood-wide appeal.

At the trustee board meeting in November, action was taken to use the package method of computing college costs to students beginning in the 1956-57 session. An over-all increase of forty dollars per year with a composite cost of $950 for board, room and tuition for resident students was voted. The increase was deemed necessary to accomodate increasing instruction costs and to help avoid recurring budget deficits.

The college glee clubs under the direction of Prof. Nelson T. Huffman have presented Handel's oratorio, The Messiah, four times this month: Dec. 4 at the Second Baptist Church Staunton; Dec. 9 and 11 at the college; and Dec. 14 at the Manassas high school in Eastern Virginia.

The drama department effectively moved their audiences in presenting the Chinese play, Lute Song, in November. Mrs. Betty Geiser was the director.

Carlisle Whitelow, freshman and son of the late Faith Whitelow, college cook for more than twenty-five years, is the first Negro to play on Eagle varsity teams, having played on the football team this session and presently the basketball team.

Government is the Christian's Business

More and more Christians are discovering the strategic role played by government in today's complex world. Government decisions greatly influence our lives, our homes, our businesses, our farms, our factories, our mission programs at home and abroad, our relations with other nations. Government decisions make for war or peace. Are we Christians and the church showing sufficient concern for the decisions of government? Are we trying to influence government toward more Christian policies? Are we carrying our share of Christian responsibility for better government?

The purpose of the Washington-United Nations Seminars is to improve our Christian citizenship. By studying first hand the processes of government and current issues in Washington and at the United Nations we can participate more intelligently and effectively as Christians in our home communities and in our occupations.

Below is listed essential information about Brethren seminars. For further information, write to the Brethren Service Commission, General Brotherhood Board, 22 S. State St., Elgin, Ill.

Have you often wanted to visit Washington and the United Nations but have never had the opportunity?

Has it ever been your desire to meet your own representatives and senators and to discuss with them a particular problem?

Have you sometimes wanted to see just what happens at a committee hearing in Washington?

Has it been one of your hopes to see the Senate or House in action?

Have you ever wondered just how the United Nations' committees effectively do business when so many different languages are spoken?

Has it at times been your hope to meet Andrew Cordier, executive assistant to the Secretary General of the United Nations?

Have you often wanted to see for yourself the beautiful new buildings of the United Nations?

The Brethren Washington-United Nations Seminars provide all of these opportunities—and more! Plan now to take advantage of these opportunities in 1956—under Brethren leadership!

IDEAS—PLANS—METHODS

A Church Planning Retreat

FOR some time the leaders of our church have shared the conviction that we ought to be doing a more effective job of planning for the future of Christ's work in our community. Too long we have been living in a hand-to-mouth, need-to-need fashion. For some time we had set our sights on a planning retreat for all the church commissions and officers, in which we could be free from routine business and concentrate on planning the year ahead. This year the first one became a reality. Believing that our experiment may stimulate further creative effort in this area, we would like to share our experience.

We tried to make careful and detailed preparations. The date of a Sunday afternon and evening was set well ahead of the beginning of the church year. It was announced a number of weeks in advance and with the announcement, it was made clear that every officer and commission member was expected to be present. The committee planning for the retreat secured a place away from the church, providing privacy and quiet, yet with room adequate for the group. A group was enlisted to care for the children of families involved on the parsonage lawn. Another group was enlisted to prepare and serve a simple lunch, paid for by the church.

Nearer the actual date, personal letters of invitation were sent to each person involved. Careful follow up resulted in an attendance of almost ninety per cent of the people involved (with twenty-two children at the parsonage).

Equally careful attention was given the direction the afternoon and evening work should take. A time schedule was established. Brief devotional thoughts were followed by a short presentation by the district executive secretary, lifting up the need for and values of planning and organization in the church program. The group then proceeded to the primary purpose for the day—to determine what one objective above all others ought to receive the concerted attention of the church during the next year. The group was divided into small groups of six each, with the district executive secretary, the elder, the pastor and the chairman of the church board serving as resource persons. By alternating buzz group sessions with the total group sharing periods, the thinking of the group was crystallized before the supper hour and an objective of Deepening Our Spiritual Fellowship was adopted.

Refreshed by the tasty lunch, the group quickly reassembled to continue their thinking. A new approach was presented. Each commission was asked to meet separately to consider in its sphere of work what contribution they could make during the year to the achievement of the goal just previously adopted.

So each group set themselves to the task of outlining on paper the specific jobs which they as a commission would plan to work at during the coming year. Special emphasis was to be given to the points relating directly to the over-all objective of deepening the spiritual fellowship. Special orders were given that no one was to spend time on routine business. Planning was the order of the day and plan we did, concluding our session with each commission chairman putting on a large blackboard the outline just worked out, thus giving the total group a panoramic view of the plans for the year ahead. Needless to say, the worship which followed our final evaluation was a truly significant experience. It was this total report, further evaluated, which was submitted to council meeting for action immediately prior to the beginning of the church year.

We do not feel that we have arrived, but we feel that we have begun something significant. No meeting of the church has created more enthusiasm, or more satisfaction that we really accomplished something. Our planning was not complete and our follow-through has not progressed in ideal fashion, but we do have the conviction that this planning retreat, which coincided with the beginning of a major building program, marks a determination that as we build a building, we shall also build a church.—Walter D. Bowman, pastor, Ft. McKinley church, Dayton, Ohio.

Memorial Service Suggestions

SORROW is to be consecrated to God. It is to be the occasion of a new self-offering to God—a truly sacramental act of resting life, its pain, perplexity and purpose in the very heart of God. The world in its materialism and naturalism often exploits the lonely sorrowing heart—but the ministry must guide the aching heart away from clutches of this aridness and emptiness, into the simplicity of childlike trusting in God. This would mean a simple but meaningful memorial service without the overbuying and showiness that is encouraged today. Also, a directing of the sorrowing away from the body which is the outworn shell of the soul—to the ongoingness of that spirit in God's Beyond" (from the Manual of Worship and Polity, p. 81).

It is the earnest desire of our church to give every consideration to the needs of our people in times of sorrow. It is because of this that we feel it wise to write down our suggested procedures, so that every family will be able to know the services given. We must keep in mind that ours is a Christian faith and as believers we have a faith and moral standard to uphold. The best way the church can help in times of sorrow is to use God's principles of spiritual comfort and not worldly whims or fancies.

Over a period of time, if there are no values and places of evaluation, our service could become so full of strange customs that the spiritual would be nearly lost. Because of this, we set the following up as a guide at funeral and memorial services.

1. That the spiritual be kept in mind. Let us remember the soul and the spirit of our loved one just departed, rather than the body.

2. That the viewing be done before the service begins, and we suggest that the family's last viewing be done in private at the funeral home. The pastor will be glad to conduct brief services at that time at the funeral home with members of the family if they so desire.

3. That the casket be closed and in place before the family arrives at the church for the memorial service.

4. That the casket remain closed during and after the service.

5. That caution be exercised in moving flowers so as to preserve them and not to spill the acidy water on carpets and pews.

6. That only a few (six to ten) flower arrangements be brought into the church. Choice of pieces to be determined by the family. Flowers are for the family to enjoy rather than for show. We would suggest to our friends that money which would be used for flowers might otherwise be used as a memorial to the remembrance of the departed one. Suggestions: church library books with proper inscription; church equipment or furnishings; hospital memorials; and others.

7. That the family consider the counsel of the pastor in these matters. He should be in charge of the program at the church and not an undertaker or friend. The pastor is a man of God and by his training and experience will be able to counsel wisely in the Christian way.

8. There is no charge for these services of the church. If you feel you appreciate the service your church gives to you and others, you may want to be more regular in attending the church activities and in giving regular offerings to carry on the work of Christ and those Christians who went before us.

For Service Rendered the Church

IN THE last half-century the total population of the United States has doubled, while the number of persons over sixty-five has quadrupled. This fact, cited by Margaret Frakes in the current Christian Century series on The Church and Older People, has broad ramifications in the political, economic and social complexion of the nation. Churches especially need to be alert to the aging population trend.

One phase of this trend as related to the churches concerns security provisions for persons retiring from the full-time service of the church. For more than fifty years the Church of the Brethren has endeavored to give some financial assistance to missionaries, ministers and their widows.

Last year, through the Ministerial and Missionary Service Fund, ninety-eight Brethren received a total of $35,563 in quarterly grants. Though the amounts vary considerably, the average grant in aid to each family was only $30 per month.

The source by which funds are set aside for helping to care for retired servants of the church is the Brotherhood Fund, currently allocating $35,000 each year for this welfare. At present 2.7 cents out of every Brotherhood Fund dollar goes to the Ministerial and Missionary Service Fund. Requests for this assistance are studied by the Pension Board and granted upon the basis of need and of service rendered to the church.

Presently an increasing number of pastors and missionaries are acquiring savings for retirement through the pension plan, established in 1943. According to the twelfth annual report of the pension plan, issued last month by H. Spenser Minnich, secretary, 688 ministers and missionaries are enrolled. Of this number, 37 came into the plan the past year, and 87 are receiving pension payments. Contributed to the pension plan during the past year was $69,000 from members and $102,000 from congregations.

Social security, too, has been broadened to cover ministers. According to provisions of the act which became effective in January 1955, ministers must decide before April 1957 if they wish to participate. Social security payments are usually paid by the minister himself.

As full-time church workers and congregations avail themselves of the pension plan and social security opportunities, the need for grants from the Service Fund will eventually lessen, officials predict. But for an era when ministers and missionaries were without retirement savings plans, the Ministerial and Missionary Service Fund is a nominal and yet meaningful acknowledgment of services faithfully performed.—Howard Royer.

The Roman Catholic Church in South America never received the cleansing brought on by the Protestant Reformation. Consequently, its buildings remain imposing as ever but its services to the people are almost negligible

Protestant Missions in Ecuador

Faye Koontz
Missionary to Ecuador

ECUADOR is a Catholic country as is all of Latin America. The history of Catholicism began in Ecuador the very moment Spanish conquerors set foot on what today is Ecuadorian soil. Conversions were made on a wholesale basis when the priests first arrived. Some priests baptized as many as fourteen hundred people in five days.

The people, today, are really learning to worship the priests. They pay enormous fees for all religious rites, and few people have any religion except as they feel the need of the church for their baptisms, marriages and burials. The fiesta, (a religious festival), is sanctioned by the church. In fact, no fiesta in Ecuador is started unless it first has the blessing of the church. And then, from the church, they go out into the community with their drinking and dancing and merrymaking which lasts sometimes from two to three weeks. And as we go along the road in our little community, we can see drunks on every side with little children watching them. This is what the Indians understand of Christianity.

The priests are largely responsible for the low moral standards which call forth the protest from an outraged public. A proportion of the people, particularly the educated, has turned from such a travesty of religion and is drifting towards atheism and moral ruin. So the chief task of the evangelical missions in Ecuador is not to proselyte but to call to a rational faith and a pure life those people who know not the gospel or anything of Jesus Christ.

There are many people who say that South America is not a legitimate field for evangelical missions, because it is in their eyes a Christian country under the spiritual care of a sister church. We usually think of the 18th century reformation as a Protestant reformation. But we must remember that it was also a Catholic reformation and many of the current practices that we find in Ecuador were corrected so that Catholicism in South America is far different from that which we find in the United States.

It was not until 1895 that Ecuador was first opened to Protestant missions. The Christian Missionary Alliance, the Gospel Mission Union and the Seventh Day Adventists all entered at the turn of the century. In 1931 the Interdenominational World Radio Missionary Fellowship opened what today is one of the largest short-wave missionary stations in the world. It is called the Voice of the Andes and its daily broadcasts are in some fourteen different languages. Then since 1931 other missions have been entering Ecuador; in 1946 the Church of the Brethren started its mission there. The Wycliffe Translators have just recently entered the country. They are going into all parts of the jungle and translating the Scriptures into the languages of the people.

But little Protestant headway has been made in Ecuador, possibly because of much opposition. Missions which have shown great results in other lands are discouraged with their work in Ecuador. When we compare the growth of our mission in Ecuador with that of the mission stations in China and Africa and India, we too often become discouraged; instead of having baptismal services for twenty and thirty or more, we have services baptizing three and four and six and sometimes even one. We are not alone in our discouragement; all of the other missions in Ecuador are facing the same situation.

A friend of mine from another mission in Ecuador told me recently that their church in Quito might have 150 to 200 present for Sunday services. But of this number only sixty-seven are baptized members. And they are one of the first missions that entered Ecuador.

The Catholics have been doing very little practical work in Ecuador. Recently they have been awakened to the work of evangelical missions and are meeting this opposition by building orphanages, old folks' homes, schools and hospitals.

Our church members are meeting some opposition and persecution, even though they are promised religious freedom in the national constitution. Priests and nuns are coming in from Colombia, other parts of South America and Europe. They are moving into the communities where Protestant work has already been started. Some places they have forced the evangelical missions to close their work.

The Catholics have taken over a government school near our mission. Even though it is still government supported it is operated by the nuns from Colombia. Of course, this means more opposition and persecution for our Christians. It has also forced a few of our students to quit school, though we now have the largest enrollment in our history—approximately seventy. We remember also that our work had been started before we were meeting much opposition. We had been here six or seven years before we found much opposition.

We have many friends in the community and we find that our work is being blessed. From eighty to eighty-five people were present for each evening of recent evangelistic meetings. A new baptismal class has also been started in which we have six Indian boys and girls from our school and one influential family from the community. So even though we are meeting some opposition, we feel that our church is growing, and even though it might look like a dark picture to some, to us who are there it does not seem like a dark picture at all.

As we look forward to our work in Ecuador we know that the Church of Jesus Christ has been started and even though it might be that our Protestant missionaries will be forced to evacuate for a season, which we doubt very seriously, we know that the seed has been sown and will blossom and bear fruit.

SEEING NIGERIA With Dorris Blough

A JOURNEY

Long journeys by jeep in Africa require planning, forethought and endurance

YOUR understanding of Nigeria would not be well rounded without taking a trip with us. In March when we arrived in Garkida, a piece of one of my teeth broke off but it was not until April that we were able to get away to go to Jos for the dental work.

We left at 1 p. m. Saturday. Kim (four months old) was in his buggy; Susan (twenty months old) had a mattress on the floor. We took Zakama, our Nigerian house boy, since he could speak several languages. Our first stop was the Shafa station to replenish our water supply as there was a leak in the radiator. The doctor spent a couple of hours checking on the missionaries. One hour and twenty rough miles later we arrived at Wandali for supper.

We considered staying all night at Wandali since it was already 7:30, but we understood driving at night was better because it was cooler. So we settled Kim in his buggy and Susan on her mattress and set out for Jos. We were a little apprehensive about the rough roads since Marvin discovered a break in one tire which left us with no spare.

Forty miles on we came to the river Gonggola. It was necessary to ford it. A rock causeway had been built but in the dark we felt like we were going through a deep river. After that we found a somewhat better road, but even here there were times when Kim was almost thrown out of his buggy.

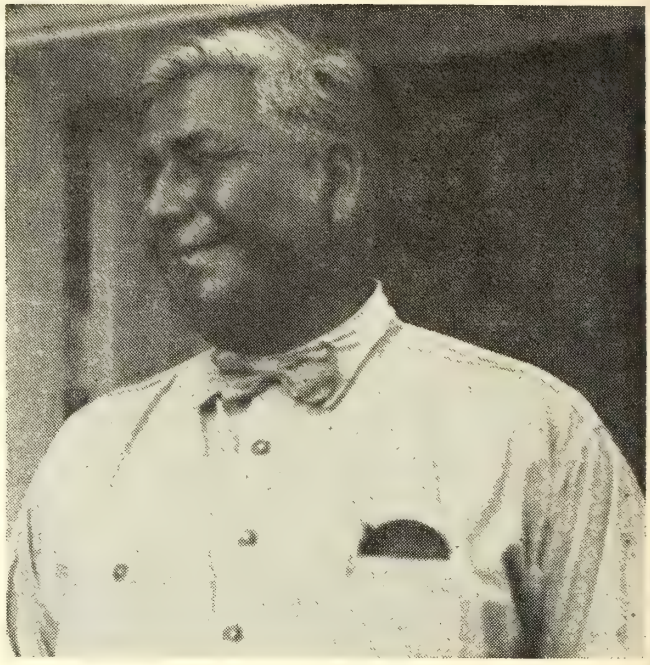
Every fifteen or twenty miles it was necessary to add water to the radiator. Finding water in the dry season in Nigeria at night is no simple undertaking. We were glad for Zakama who knew where water would likely be and also understood the language.

In each village there were small groups of people clustered around lanterns. The lanterns were on tables along with wares to sell—soap, sugar cubes and unpleasant smelling perfume. Since more people travel at night, the traders stayed up to sell their wares.

With no signs along the road, we got very sleepy and were thankful to arrive at Jos by 6:30 a. m., having safely completed 300 miles of rough travel. The tooth was repaired, we visited the shops, bought a tire, packed the car and were ready to leave again Wednesday morning. As we left we fervently hoped that there had not been a big rain on the road while we were in Jos, as one good rain can close a part of the road which would cause us to travel an all-weather road making the trip 100 miles longer.

We perked along at good speed considering that we had to stop every fifteen to twenty miles to put water into the radiator. Since there had been no big rain, we took the short cut home. Just before we reached the Gonggola River again, we heard something in the car and discovered that the main leaf of a spring had broken. It was reinforced with a piece of wood but this meant going the remaining ninety miles at about fifteen miles an hour.

After crossing the river a big rain came up. There are no bridges across most of the small stream beds which means that sometimes one has to wait until the water goes down enough to cross. This can take hours. Luckily, however, we crossed them all with only short delays to test the depth of the water or to see if any holes had been made in the roadbed by the rain.



We crept along, ate a late supper at Wandali, stopped to check on the sick people at Waka again and finally reached Garkida at 1:30 a. m. The children had slept most of the way but we were worn out, as you can imagine. This is a typical automobile journey in Africa. It was an expensive tooth but an unforgettable trip.

Missionaries in Nigeria continue to place leadership responsibility in the hands of the nationals. There are now Nigerian members on all but two of the major committees.

God's Nobleman

The story shared here is one recently printed in Indian Highways, the publication of the Charles H. Cook Christian Training School of Phoenix, Arizona, and used by their permission.

BENIGN, noble, handsome, powerful, kind, sincere and energetic—all these adjectives apply to Antonio B. Juan. An outstanding graduate of this school some years ago, he has made a tremendous impression on his and nearby tribes by superb preaching and an exemplary life. Greatly sought after as an evangelist and speaker for special occasions he was known far and wide as an unusual man.

While attending Cook Christian Training School his mother, who was Arizona's first gold star mother in World War I, was taken sick. Antonio was called home.

Sitting by her bedside, he heard her say, "Antonio, my son, last night I saw a great vision. All the sky rolled back and I saw standing there in the center, Jesus. He had such a wonderful face and he was reaching his hand down to take hold of mine, to lift me across to the other side. My son, stay right here beside me and when the end time comes I want to be sure to raise up my hand to his when he reaches down for mine. If I'm too weak, you must help me."

Antonio watched her carefully for many hours; when finally he saw the wrinkled brown hand move, he took hold of her wrist with his strong hand and raised it up.

Later as I drove him back to Cook Christian Training School he told me that as he lifted up her hand he saw her fingers close as it were around the hand of her Master.

Then he said, "I saw a kind of light come into her face—a light such as I never saw before. I think she had seen the King in his glory and it transfigured her."

It transformed Antonio too. The amount of good done by that graduate alone is known only to God. But we at Cook School are inexpressibly proud of having been the instrument used by God for Antonio's training."

As a church we should rejoice in the fact that we, too, are sharing in a ministry to the Navahos, among whom, please God, we hope we may be used to develop men and women of the Christian character and usefulness of Antonio B. Juan. Our work is young but the response to our ministry is warm and genuine. In an early issue of the Gospel Messenger we plan to share the story of our work thus far at Lybrook, our mission.—Charles E. Zunkel.

Our district has employed Bro. Ernest Jehnsen as full-time executive secretary and has purchased a property in Mt. Pleasant, where he will reside. His two-year term began Sept. 1, 1955. The women's work project for the year was to support the total Brotherhood program for six hours. The men's work groups in the local churches were encouraged by two workshops and a work day at our church camp at Brethren Heights. The men's work programs for the coming year will include the $10 Club for new churches, Michigan extension work and camp expenses and improvements. Stewardship was emphasized and stressed strongly at our district meeting. The major goal of the conference was to point out the need and values of a stewardship program. Plans are being laid to locate new churches, to secure building sites, raise funds, arrange for leaders, note pastors and care for their needs, and make community surveys. Recently a new site was purchased in the Detroit area and the new Bethany congregation was organized. The district goal is to build one new church every three years and requests that each member of each church give three dollars per year toward such a goal. Within the next five years, we are to revive and restore into full fellowship all inactive and semi-active members and make at least a ten per cent increase each year in our local church membership and attendance. The churches were encouraged at this meeting to assist their young people in finding their life's vocation in terms of the will of God and in responses to divine leading and guidance. Every Brethren youth should give serious consideration to serving at least one year in Brethren Volunteer Service. The quota for the district will be forty-five per cent higher than last year.—Ralph W. Wagoner, Muskegon, Mich.

Johnstown, Walnut Grove—Mary Schaeffer, our assistant pastor, was director of the daily vacation Bible school. The school closed with a picnic at Camp Harmony. The children gave the cantata, The Garden Guest. The last Sunday evenings of June, July and August, we joined in the city-wide services which were held at the Roxbury band shell. Brother and Sister Clyde L. Carter and Roger Berkey were delegates to Annual Conference. Conference reports were given at the midweek prayer and Bible study hour. Bro. Carter brought to us a number of tape-recorded sermons which were given at Conference. Guest speakers this past summer were Brethren J. C. Paul, T. F. Henry and our missionary, Bro. Clarence Heckman, and his wife, who spent a Sunday with us. Bro. Clarence Rasenberger brought the morning and evening messages on Sept. 29. He also held installation services for our church and Sunday-school officers. The remodeling of the basement has been completed and was first used on Sunday, Oct. 2. The fall communion was also held that same day. A German exchange student, Halmut Kruesmann, is living with the pastor and his family for the coming year. Donna Musser has entered BVS. Five have been received by letter and four by baptism during the last quarter.—Emelia Gran Strayer, Johnstown, Pa.

Locust Grove—At our recent council meeting, installation services were held for two deacons. Donald Deffenbaugh was licensed to the ministry for one year. The mission committee sponsored a program with Wilma Dishong, who has just completed a year in BVS, as the speaker. She showed slides and told about the work of the church in Falfurrias, Texas. The Good Cheer class presented a new piano to the church. During our pastor's absence, Bro. John Brumbaugh preached in our church. Our revival began Oct. 31 and continued for two weeks, with Bro. Alfred Replogle as evangelist.—Mrs. June Dishong, Johnstown, Pa.

Somerset—Since our last report, two members were received into our church by letter. The Cotton Blossom Singers of Piney Woods, Miss., presented a concert in our church. Rally day services were held Sept. 25 in the morning, and installation services were held in the evening for the new officers and teachers. Rev. Roy L. Yund from the Casebeer Lutheran church brought the message. Our church together with the other churches of Somerset took up a collection to aid the Red Cross in the flood-stricken areas. —Mrs. Samuel J. Cupp, Somerset, Pa.

THE LORD'S YEAR

JUST as there is something clean and fresh about a new leaf, there is a suggestion of renewal and opportunity about a new year. 1956 will come in on a Lord's day. Why not make it the beginning of the Lord's year?

A new page, however spotless it may appear when the leaf is turned, will not long remain clean if the fingers that handle it are soiled. The tell-tale marks of former failures soon become evident on the new leaf. So do the moral failures of 1955 have a way of carrying over into 1956 in spite of many good resolutions. Perhaps the best message for a new calendar, is the word concerning renewal that Jesus spoke to Nicodemus. A new life begins with a new birth. We cannot make 1956 better than 1955 by a mere salute to the calendar, by the turning over of new leaves or by the best of resolutions. But we can dedicate the new year to the Lord as we give him our time, our talents, our resources and our hearts through every day of 1956.

What Would Christ Say?

In regard to the article, "The Meaning of the Prayer Veil," in the Nov. 19 issue, many questions came to my mind.

What would Christ say?

What did Christ say to the Pharisees in Mark 7:1-8 about custom becoming so strong that they failed to search their hearts? Could it be that Christ could say to us, "The women honor me with their covered heads, but their hearts are far from me; in vain do they worship me, teaching in doctrines the precepts of men. You leave the commandment of God, and hold fast to the tradition of men."

If I need to put on my prayer veil to worship God, it means I should wear it when I'm washing dishes, scrubbing floors, walking in the rain or going to sleep at night. Does it mean if I take it off I am separated from God's enduring love and goodness? How can this be true when God is always above me and around me?

If wearing the prayer veil means I am on the same level with the other women, how would I feel walking into a different denomination with it on? Would I be on a higher level or a lower (more humble) level than the other women? If I considered myself more humble wouldn't that really be my pride stepping out? And to be on a higher level would defeat my purpose.

If I have to put on a prayer veil to "cover up frills" as a choir robe why would I wear the frills in the first place? Didn't God see them before I "covered them up"? Why should I believe that God would see me some places and not others?

But you say, I should put on my veil to be worthy of worshiping God and to show my submission. Does that act in itself clean out my resentments, fears, envy and other impurities? I have experienced it as not doing so.

Symbols can be beautiful, but what good do they do us if they are always outward and are not personally inspired by the Holy Spirit? Let us submit to God each day our fears, worries, jealousies, resentments, pride, suspicions, greediness and self-interests so that he may cleanse our hearts and minds. Let us recognize that God's love is with us every minute of the day, looking into our attitudes no matter where we are or what we are doing. If we let him take over our thoughts and acts, aren't we being "apart from the world"?—Mrs. Robert Rhoades, Covington, Ohio.

The Prayer Veil—Is It Fair to All?

We who grew up in a Brethren home can accept the traditions of the church with very little thought or effort on our part. Is it fair to expect the same of a young girl who does not have such a background? I knew a young girl who was very timid, and so had very few friends. In high school she found a friend who was a member of the Church of the Brethren. After attending services there a few times, she soon realized she could not be a member there, because of the prayer veil.

I understand the veil, mentioned in the Bible, completely covered the head and face. It seemed Paul realized that the women of that day were getting "out of line," so to speak. They were seeking admiration of men other than their own husbands. So I can see how a veil that would cover their flirting eyes and "come hither" smiles would be beneficial in putting them in their rightful place in relation to their husbands. In that respect I can see why it was recommended that they were to wear the veil when they took an active part such as teaching.

I can't see where the prayer veil of today would serve that purpose. I really think time is being wasted "quibbling" over traditions and not enough time is spent learning how to live a life that is true to the example of Jesus, such as being kind, compromising, forgiving and peaceful. We are being too concerned about the "outward appearance." 1 Sam. 16:7 tells us "the Lord looks on the heart."

The great commission, Mark 16: 15, tells us to go preach the gospel to all. It doesn't seem right to make it something difficult to accept. So I ask, in the case of the young girl, can we say that God did not want her to be one of his family, if she would not accept the traditions of the church, such as the prayer veil? —Dorothy Naragon, North Liberty, Ind.

The Week of Prayer—

Sending Our Spiritual Roots Deeper

Glen Weimer

THE Week of Prayer can be merely a religious slogan or it can be a time of serious discipline. We need not expect a great change in human living until prayer becomes the heart of life and life becomes unceasing communion with God. For the Christian, life is a continuous conversation, communion and co-operation with God. And we are under constraint to strengthen and deepen this relationship with God. Our Lord pierces our prayerless lives with his words, "Men ought always to pray . . . Thy kingdom come." How else can man recover and train his sense of the holy, the moral, the beautiful and the true?

The meaning of life and its fulfillment is in prayer. The less we pray, the less we live. The prayerless heart is the aching heart, the fearful heart, the frustrated heart. Prayerlessness imprisons us in this world and binds us to the temporal, the transient, the seasonal leaves that have their day and then cease to be. So the Week of Prayer is a time of grace for sending life's spiritual roots deeper. As William Temple put it, "The great reality of life is prayer; all that is worth while flows from that."

Use this week then as a time for disciplined study of the meaning of prayer. The impulse to pray is native to man. It is the one sign of God universally revealed in humanity. The urge to pray is of God; it is God calling us into continuous conversation and co-operation with him. But the capacity for prayer may be unused, undeveloped and forfeited. And so life's vitality wanes. Are you responding to God's presence and call in your life?

Further, turn to the New Testament and study the meaning of prayer in the life of Jesus. There are nine recorded retreats for prayer and seven prayers in the synoptic gospels besides other references to Jesus praying. Jesus not only prayed; his whole life was prayer. Why not give ourselves to the serious study of the Master's prayer life?

Moreover, give attention to the meaning of prayer in the life of humanity. Turn to the journals, letters, diaries and biographies of God's great men and women in other times, the transparent souls in whom God was felt and seen to live vitally. Read and ponder the liturgical prayers of the church prayed through the centuries. Finally, let the Holy Spirit show you the meaning of prayer in a struggling world like ours, in which the divine order is trying to be born. For "men ought always to pray . . . Thy kingdom come."

The Week of Prayer is a time for creative waiting on God. One might call this disciplined waiting on God. Only as we adore God, rejoice in his realness, personality, do we establish the conditions of openness for him to act mightily in and through us. The patient, loving adoration of God is missing from many lives today. There are no hallowed moments for focusing life lovingly on God—for setting the arrow of desire to the bowstring of God. And so we do not sense or discern his presence in the life of common days and work. The roots of prayer go deeper as we lovingly adore God. This means the creative use of silence in which life is open to the recreating power of God.

We try to take life in our own hands too much; we seek to bend it to fit our plans; we rely too exclusively on our human resources, and so our hands falter. Learn to wait adoringly, patiently before God, yes, until God thinks through your mind, sees through your eyes, feels life through your heart and acts through your will. Wait, and God will show you a vaster world—the world of his concerns that begins right where we live.

Let small fellowship groups be formed that will practice creative silence and waiting on God. And they will learn to recognize and identify the living Lord in the common life and so live in continuous communion and co-operation with him. Wait, and rejoice in what God is, in what God has done, in what God is doing and will finally accomplish. How unspeakably great that love and work of God is! We see its radiant human form in Christ but how feebly we love the Love that loves us so everlastingly.

Wait on God! Too often prayer is a hurried, reckless, irreverent telling God what we want. How easily we slip into the habit of thinking that God is to be used by us, that we can employ him for our plans and how reluctant we are to sacrifice our desires—our very selves—that he might reveal in and through us his rule of power and love. So in trying to use God we lose him. Wait, let life flow out in loving attention to God and God will have freedom to act mightily in and through one's life.

Once I saw the great ore boats at the Soo lifted by a greater power than their own, to a new level of freedom and destiny. The waiting was not time wasted—but time redeemed and fulfilled. They that wait shall be renewed by the rule of God's power and love.

Again, the Week of Prayer is a time for disciplined penitence before God. Life is so encrusted with selfishness, egotism, spiritual pride, self-assertiveness, competitiveness, striving for place and power, possessiveness and lovelessness, that it is insulated against the rule of God's love and power. These attitudes are the seeds of social disorder and personal tragedy. The Week of Prayer calls us to an honest stripping of these layers of evil from life—of honestly owning up to our standing in the way of his rule of love—of confessing that we do constantly scuttle his dream and design for our lives. The transformation of society can only go forward as we individually are redeemed from our sins. Prayer is the discipline of penitence and confession. It is giving God a chance to dig deeply into your life. Uproot sin in your life; then the root of devotion can go deeper.

Penitence is a fundamental element in that life of continuous conversation, communion and co-operation with God. Let every member of the church give attention to this issue of need during the Week of Prayer. Spoken confession within a fellowship group devoted to prayer would open the gates of new life to many souls. For there is too much "me" in me for God to use me effectively, for his rule of power and love to be visible and vital in and through me. We live shut up in the little world of our thoughts, plans and programs—while God's infinitely greater world is at our feet calling us to press forward into it. How little and petty we are! But how big and important we think we are! There is something in us that blocks God's creative work through us. That "something" must go. Penitent prayer is the way we let go of it.

"Men ought always to pray . . . Thy kingdom come." For so the roots of spiritual life go deeper.

MILDRED ALLEN JEFFERY

Last night I started counting sheep when I had gone to bed,
For I had worries large and small which drove sleep from my head.
The sheep had many little lambs and these I counted too,
Thus through the flock I went until the shepherd came in view.
And then I thought, "Why spend my time in simply counting sheep
When I can walk with him and pray for folk who cannot sleep?"
I walked with him a while, and then he smiled and said to me—
"Look back, where are your worries now?" but not one could I see!

The Power of Conformity

CAN YOU hold on to your convictions when most persons take contrary views? Can you stick up for what you think to be right even when your best friends fail you? If you can stand out against the majority, even when the test concerns a simple matter of plain fact, you are an unusual person indeed.

In order to test the power of conformity a psychology professor devised a simple but significant experiment. He prepared two cards, one with a standard black line and another with three lines, one of which was the same length as the standard line. There was no trick, no optical illusion about the simple test. Even a small child, given the two cards, could quickly point to the lines that were equal.

But the test was given to college students in small groups of seven to nine persons. The "trick" was that in each group a few persons were asked to give false answers. The experiment sought to find out what college students would do when they discovered that others in their group failed to give what seemed to be an obvious answer.

The results were disturbing, to say the least. Only one person in four would stand by his own convictions to the end. The other three hesitated and, when group pressure seemed to contradict their own best judgment, they went with the group. The psychologists concluded, "We have found the tendency to conformity in our society so strong that reasonably intelligent and well-meaning young people are willing to call white black."

The experiment also showed, however, that the presence of only one person as a supporting partner tends to encourage another to hold on to his convictions. It is possible to observe how vitally important for Christians is the small fellowship of like-minded persons. If it is difficult for persons to hold on to their ideas of obvious facts, how much more likely are they to be swayed in questions of conduct and behavior, in situations where the lines between right and wrong are less clearly defined?

At first glance, the results of an experiment like this one may seem to discourage any effort to fight the evils of conformity. It looks as if, simply by living in the world, we are constantly being brain-washed. What chance have we to insist on a message that is not popular or to stand for ideals that are scorned?

The answer to conformity was concisely stated by Paul in a familiar part of his letter to the Roman church. There is a positive side to nonconformity. In place of simply conforming to the world, says Paul, we are to be transformed by the renewing of our minds in order to prove what is the good and acceptable and perfect will of God. There is nothing negative about being transformed. It can be a growing, developing experience through which we renew our minds as we discover and as we follow the mind of Christ.—K.M.

Big and Little Issues

AFTER thirty-two years in the House of Lords during which he never said a word, the Marquess of Cholmondeley was moved to make his maiden speech. He had sat through discussions about the depression, the conduct of the war and the titanic problems that have faced the British Empire in recent years. But the Marquess did not speak up until the business of the House included a bill to outlaw and exterminate the rabbit. The Marquess hated the little animals so much that he spoke for four minutes urging the lords to do something about the rabbit.

Before you raise an eyebrow over the Marquess's seeming indifference to vital issues, ask yourself whether it is the really important issues in our day that bestir you to action. Many persons who attend their church council meetings will sit through the discussions about basic policy, but they become suddenly vocal when they have a chance to voice their pet peeves. We can run a dozen articles in the Gospel Messenger on the basic doctrines of our faith without receiving a letter from readers; but if someone should timidly suggest that all our ministers should wear robes, we could expect a flood of mail.

Perhaps it was the pettiness of the Pharisees' concerns—for tithing mint and herbs and neglecting "justice and the love of God"—that aroused the indignation of Jesus as much as did their legalism and their hypocrisy. Someone has said that persons are just as big as the things they let bother them. The small man merely hates rabbits and when he speaks it is to voice his annoyances. The bigger person can overlook smaller irritations because he dare not neglect the bigger issues of "justice and the love of God."—K. M

WE FACE another year—a year through which we have never traveled, and of which we know absolutely nothing. What the year may bring to us is beyond our knowledge; what our experience will be cannot be foretold. All lies hidden beyond the veil.

It reminds us of the word of the Lord to Joshua when the children of Israel came to the bank of the Jordan. God said, "You have not passed this way before." He was bringing them into a new country and by a way they did not know and, behold, the river Jordan lay as an obstruction before them. It was in flood and there was no bridge and they had no boats. Then the Lord made a way for them. The priests bearing the ark of the covenant led the way, and as their feet touched the water the river divided and made a way for the multitude. The ark of the covenant was the visible sign of the presence of the Lord in their midst, and as it went before them they could safely follow.

This is the word of the Lord to us as we stand on the threshhold of another year: "You have not passed this way before." We know not the way; we cannot see ahead; we must walk by faith, not by sight. But the Lord graciously will lead the way if we ask him. "Lead thou me on. Keep thou my feet; I do not wish to see the distant scene-one step enough for me." If God leads the way we can go forward courageously and confidently into the year before us.

A good motto for the year would be the words of Paul in Phil. 3:12; "I press on." With Paul we, too, have not reached our goal; we are not yet perfected; God's purpose in calling us is not completely fulfilled. God gives us another year, so we must press on; we must stretch forward, ever forward, reaching toward the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

"One thing I do, forgetting the things that are behind . . . I press on." See Paul's determination. He was lying in prison when he wrote this, yet he would press on. He would throw off everything that would impede his progress. He would forget the past, and he had so much to forget; stripes, stoning, imprisonment, shipwrecks, tumults, labors, fastings, journeys, hunger, cold, disappointments with unfaithful brethren, anxiety for the welfare of the churches. Much to forget indeed!

As we leave the old year there is much we too should forget, especially the unpleasant and trying things of life, such as, sorrows, pains, fears, losses; hardships, temptations, disappointments; slights, wrongs, hurts, insults, offenses; gossip, false tales, misunderstandings.

These are the things that should pass away with the old year. To carry them along will mean heavy and burdensome baggage. We must forget them. What others have done against us must be quickly forgotten. To hold them in our memory means to harbor a festering sore. It does not pay. It will mean irreparable loss to ourselves. But people say, "I can forgive, but I cannot forget." when one cannot forget it is likely that forgiveness was not genuine. The better way is to refuse to take offense when some one does an unkind act to us. It does great harm to ourselves to hold a grudge or ill will toward any one. Forgive and forget.

But there are some things that we should never forget: God's mercies and benefits (Psa. 103: 2), the kindness of others, our own sins, mistakes, failures.

The psalmist said truly, "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits." Then he enumerates these benefits: forgiveness, healing, redemption, love and mercy, fulfilled desire. These rich blessings we should never forget. Oh, the Lord is so good and gracious to us! As Moses said to Israel, "Beware lest thou forget the Lord."

The good we do and the kindnesses we show to others we should forget. To cherish them in memory may lead to pride and boasting. But the good others do to us we should never forget. The many kindnesses that our friends and brethren show to us we should store in our memories and treasure them. These are the pleasant things of life which will help to drive out the unpleasant. Treasure the lovely, forget the unlovely.

And what about our sins? Dare we not forget them? No, not until we have confessed them and thoroughly repented of them and made amends for them; then, and then only dare we forget them. But blessed truth! Having obtained forgiveness we may forget them and go on rejoicing. We need not burden our consciences with them longer. The Lord is both able and willing to forgive us of our sins, and set us free. Learn what we can from our past failures; then we may move happily onward.

So let us press on toward the stature of the fullness of Christ, as Paul did. There is no benefit in weeping over wasted time and lost opportunities, but rather let us take new courage and press forward with Christ. He is giving us another year in which to serve him.

The Meanings of "Persuade"

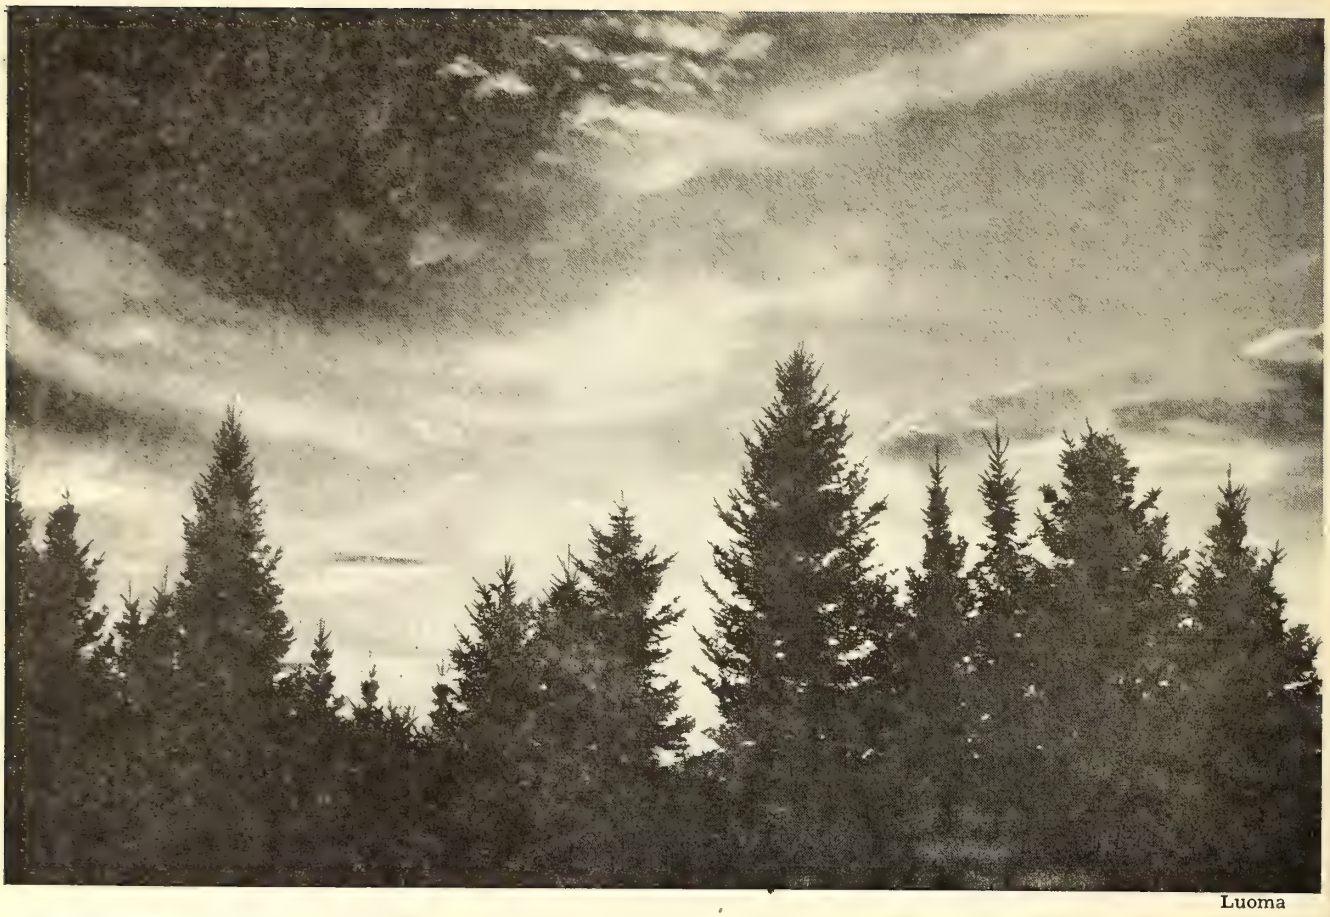
Luther A. Weigle

THE word persuade now implies success; we speak of persuading a man only if our arguments and pleas prevail upon him to accept the judgment or make the decision to which we urge him. But this is not necessarily so in the King James Version of the Bible. In Acts 19:8-9 we read of Paul's "disputing and persuading" at Corinth, with the result that some "were hardened, and believed not, but spake evil of that way." In Acts 28:23 we are told that at Rome "there came many to him into his lodging; to whom he expounded and testified the kingdom of God, persuading them concerning Jesus, both out of the law of Moses, and out of the prophets, from morning till evening"; but the next verse records that some believed and some did not. The Revised Standard Version uses the terms "arguing and pleading" in the account of his work at Corinth, and it uses "trying to convince them" in the account of the day at Rome.

On the other hand, "persuade" is used in its full sense in such passages as Matt. 27:20, Acts 14:19 and 19:26. And "I am persuaded" is hardly strong enough in most contexts where the passive form of the Greek verb appears. The Revised Standard Version of Rom. 8:38-39 reads: "For I am sure that neither death, nor life . . . nor anything else in all creation, will be able to separate us from the love of God in Christ Jesus our Lord." Note also "be convinced" (Luke 20:6); "fully convinced" (Rom. 4:21; 14:5); "I am sure" (2 Tim. 1:5, 12); "we feel sure" (Heb. 6:9).

In the Old Testament, the word persuade usually has a bad sense, being used as the equivalent of entice, mislead or deceive. Compare 1 Kings 22:20, 21, 22 where King James uses "persuade" for the same Hebrew verb which it translates "entice" in 2 Chron. 18:19, 20, 21. Or compare the accounts concerning Hezekiah found in 2 Kings 18 and 19, 2 Chron. 32, and Isa. 36 and 37.

Stars



FRED STROHM

I like to stroll out in the night
And see the stars with beaming light;
Each has a radiance all its own
For centuries its light has shown.

I've wondered how each knows its place
Shining there in yonder space,
Each living thing on earth would say
The stars were here before my day.

Like stars we have a light to share;
Withhold our light we do not dare.
This world needs every single light,
For otherwise it's dark as night.

Shine forth, O little star in me,
Shine out until all men are free.
The light of Christ—a noonday Sun—
Would thou each star light everyone.

The heavens are telling the glory of God; and the firmament proclaims his handiwork. Day to day pours forth speech, and night to night declares knowledge"

HEBREW POETRY

Lucile Long Strayer

ONE OF the ways in which the average reader can increase his appreciation of the Bible as literature is to learn something about Hebrew poetry. The question of what distinguishes Hebrew poetry from prose is not the easiest in the world to answer, particularly since many people have only the vaguest notion of what separates English poetry from prose. Probably every English teacher has sometime in her career spoken of Shakespeare's poetry, and a student, working through Julius Caesar or some similar play, has inquired plaintively, "Poetry? Did Shakespeare write poetry?"

Instead of seeking to analyze the teacher's feelings at this point, let us recognize that to the average person, rhyme is the sign of poetry. When the Counselor (this is in the novel, Lorna Doone), pretending to make the cream rise because in so doing he could get his hands on a valuable diamond necklace, recited certain words to Annie, Annie replied, "Oh, sir, I'm sure it's magic because it rhymes!" Annie has many followers today who are as sure as she that if something rhymes, it must have a little of magic in it and therefore be poetry.

Actually, although rhyme is very common in English poetry, rhythm is the distinguishing characteristic. This is usually defined as the regular recurrence of accented syllables, so that a person can "keep time" to poetry just as he does to music. A child does literally "keep time" to the Mother Goose rhymes, clapping his hands or marching about the room to the sharply accented beats of Jack be *nim*ble,

Jack be quick,
Jack jump *ov*er the *can*dle*stick*.

Here the eight accents are unmistakable to any ear. Shakespeare's blank verse does not sound in the ear with such drum-like beats, but in spite of the variety of his lines, the general pattern (iambic pentameter, if you want the name for it) is still there and is the reason for part of the pleasure we find in reading them.

Free verse, which has been very popular in our century, drops the regular accent of ordinary poetry for what its admirers sometimes call cadence, a kind of balancing of phrase against phrase which ignores the movement of the individual syllable. At its best, it can achieve some very fine effects; it is like our English translations of Hebrew poetry in that it lacks rhyme and rhythm. At its worst, it can be only a kind of chopped up prose, and not good prose at that.

Hebrew poetry used neither rhyme nor rhythm, the scholars tell us (we are speaking of this poetry now in its original form, not in translation). As a matter of fact, the absence of these is one reason why our English translations of the Hebrew verse are so remarkably good. Anyone who has translated prose from one language to another knows how hard it is to get absolute accuracy—some say it is never achieved. If to this fundamental problem is added the difficulties of reproducing a special rhythm and rhyme, the task is well-nigh impossible. But scholars agree that the lovely lines which we are familiar with in the English language reproduce with unusual fidelity the movement and style as well as the meaning of the original Hebrew.

The characteristic form of Hebrew poetry is parallelism. This means simply that the typical form is the couplet in which the second line echoes the thought and form of the first. Consider a few familiar verses from the Psalms:

The heavens declare the glory of God;
and the firmament sheweth his handywork.

The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof;
the world, and they that dwell therein.

I will bless the Lord at all times;
his praise shall continually be in my mouth.

Fret not thyself because of evil-doers, neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity.

It takes only a moment's thought to recognize how in these verses the second line picks up the thought of the first and echoes it. Our professor of Bible literature told us years ago that the second Psalm is so perfectly an example of this parallelism

---

O give thanks to the Lord, for he is good;
for his steadfast love endures forever!
Let the redeemed of the Lord say so,
whom he has redeemed from trouble and gathered in from the lands, from the east and from the west,
from the north and from the south.

He turns rivers into desert, springs of water into thirsty ground,
a fruitful land into a salty waste,
because of the wickedness of its inhabitants.
He turns a desert into pools of water,
a parched land into springs of water.
And there he lets the hungry dwell, and they establish a city to live in;
they sow fields and plant vineyards,
and get a fruitful yield.
By his blessing they multiply greatly;
and he does not let their cattle decrease.
—Psa. 107: 1-3; 33-38.

that you can go through the verses separating the first line of each couplet from the second, and have two complete psalms when you are through. However, as he pointed out, neither will sound like poetry. For, as he well said, two negatives do not make an affirmative, and an excited or emphatic no, no does not mean yes. The repetition simply means that the emotions are involved in the one kind of refusal, and poetry appeals not to the mind alone, but primarily to the heart. So this repetition in Hebrew poetry is not error at all; the Hebrew poet simply was not content until he had made the double appeal to the imagination just because he was so much in earnest about what he was saying.

The student who becomes interested in the form of Hebrew poetry will find that many authors have taken this elemental characteristic and have made elaborate analyses of the different kinds of parallelism. Most of us can read intelligently and sympathetically enough if we recognize two only. In the Psalms, as the verses quoted indicate, the second line of the couplet repeats in different words the thought of the first. In Proverbs, the usual form is antithetical. It should be recognized, however, that the idea expressed is the same, although the form is antithetical. Consider some examples of this:

A soft answer turneth away wrath;
but grievous words stir up anger.

Righteousness exalteth a nation;
but sin is a reproach to any people.

A wise son maketh a glad father;
but a foolish son is the heaviness of his mother.

A merry heart doth good like a medicine;
but a broken spirit drieth the bones.

H. Armstrong Roberts

" 'Have you entered the storehouses of the snow, or have you seen the storehouses of the hail?' "

The couplets which are so characteristic of Hebrew poetry occasionally turn into triplets, as in the first Psalm.

Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners,
nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful.

And sometimes we have what might be called quatrains, as in Isaiah:

Though your sins be as scarlet,
they shall be as white as snow;
though they be red like crimson,
they shall be as wool.

The modern versions are entirely right, of course, in printing the poetic parts of the Bible in a way to indicate this parallelism. But poetry appeals primarily to the ear, not the eye, and no one understands Hebrew poetry until his ear recognizes it without aid of the printed page. (I have been using the King James version, but arranging the verses to make the parallelism clear, since I cannot appeal to your ear through the printed page.) The listener should know immediately when the minister passes from prose to poetry in his reading from the Bible because the ear picks up this parallelism.

There are other things to be said about the form of Hebrew poetry that are interesting, but certainly less important than this central matter of parallelism. The Hebrews wrote alphabetic poems, using their letter A to begin the first couplet, or the first line of a couplet, the letter B for the second, and so on. In translation, we have no evidence of this, and so must let the scholars tell us which poems are thus written. A psalm with either eleven or twenty-two verses may be suspected, however, for the Hebrews had twenty-two letters in their alphabet. And the famous Psalm 119 can be recognized as alphabetic, for there the poet wrote eight succeeding couplets beginning with the letter A, another eight beginning with the letter B, and so on right through to the end. All versions reproduce the Hebrew letters at the beginnings of these sections, and no one need have trouble remembering how long the longest chapter in the Bible is: the verses number eight times twenty-two. The lovely poem in praise of a virtuous woman (Prov. 31:10-31) is an alphabetic poem.

The use of refrain in the Psalms occurs sometimes, where a central theme is repeated something like the chorus of a modern song. Psalm 80 is an excellent example of this, and a very fine poem apart from the use of refrain. The most intricate stanza pattern that can be found in the collection of psalms is that of Psalm 107, where after an introductory verse, four sections may be discovered, each paralleling the one before in structure and using refrain as a part of this parallelism. The latter part of this psalm is written in the usual couplets.

It is interesting to note that the parallelism of the typical Hebrew couplet reminds us of the qualities of early Hebrew narratives, where the additive type of sentence, with ands and buts and fors, and the tendency to repetition of details of the story have much in common with the loosely constructed couplet, the second line of which so often begins with either and or but. There is the same feeling of deliberate, unhurried movement, of delight in detail, of time for enjoyment of either the emotion or the story that is being presented.

The quality of objectivity which is so noticeable in Hebrew narratives is, of course, equally important in Hebrew poetry. Just as the storyteller spoke of the face "not toward" him instead of the feeling that prompted the turning away of the face, just as he said that Saul eyed David instead of explaining how Saul felt, so the Hebrew poet uses the concrete term to make vivid the inner feeling. When the psalmist talks of God, it is not in theological terms; on the contrary, God is a rock, a fortress, a buckler, a high tower, our refuge and strength, our keeper, a helper, a judge, a king, a father of the fatherless, a shepherd. Says the poet:

For in the time of trouble he shall hide me in his pavilion; in the secret of his tabernacle shall he hide me;
he shall set me up upon a rock.

Says the prophet (and the prophets have given us some of our finest poetry):

And a man shall be as an hiding place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest;

as rivers of water in a dry place, as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land.

The reader can open the Book of Proverbs on almost any page and find remarkably vivid examples of the gift of speaking concretely, examples that delight the mind and strike home to the imagination with irresistible force.

As vinegar to the teeth, and as smoke to the eyes, so is the sluggard to them that send him.

As a jewel of gold in a swine's snout,
so is a fair woman which is without discretion.

Heaviness in the heart of man
maketh it stoop;
but a good word maketh it glad.

Where no wood is, there the fire
goeth out;
so where there is no talebearer,
the strife ceaseth.

Better is a dinner of herbs where love is,
than a stalled ox and hatred therewith.

Such vivid language is highly figurative. Two of our most common figures of speech are the simile and the metaphor. When the poet says, "The Lord is my rock and my salvation," he is using a metaphor; in other words, he is saying that the Lord is the thing which typifies for us a quality of God. When another poet says a man shall be "as an hiding place from the wind," he is using a simile; he is saying one thing resembles another. In both instances the comparison is imaginative; no serious person believes that God actually looks like a rock, or that a man resembles rivers of water in appearance. The mind accepts and interprets the likeness, and the imagination is at once stimulated and satisfied with the vividness of the comparison. In the same way, hyperbole (obvious exaggeration, not to deceive, but to stir the imagination) is used in Hebrew poetry just as it is in our own. Psalm 29 is a magnificent picture of a thunderstorm in the mountains, and the poet says:

The voice of the Lord breaketh
the cedars;
yea, the Lord breaketh the cedars of Lebanon.

He maketh them also to skip like a calf;

REFLECTIONS AFTER CHRISTMAS

ORA W. GARBER

I. The Absent Guest

Our downtown streets were colorful and bright
With Santas, holly wreaths and silver bells.
Stores had been thronged with shoppers—that dispels
The merchants' fears that business would be light.
Each home too was a cheery, friendly sight,
With beauty, warmth and tantalizing smells
And all from which good Christmas cheer up-wells.
To merry hearts the day had seemed just right.

Yet there was lack in all this festive air:
Some vital factor that we could not see,
Much giving but scant Christmas charity,
A large abundance but not much to share
With those in need. And Jesus—where was he?
It was his birthday, but he was not there.

II. The Presence

The Christmas bells rang out the Savior's birth,
In joyous tones their gospel tidings told
O'er vaster spaces than was true of old
When angels sang their song of ageless worth.
From Nome to Delhi, from Berlin to Perth,
From Quito to Dakar their music rolled
Until their message, eloquent and bold,
Reached the remotest corners of the earth.

As on our lives the sacred accents fell
Our souls responded in a joyful way.
Our faith was strengthened. As we paused to pray,
An unseen Presence placed a holy spell
Upon us, and we sensed anew that day
The coming of our Lord, Immanuel.

Lebanon and Sirion like a young unicorn.

It is possible to read this entire psalm and get a vivid impression of wind and lightning and thunder and probably earthquake—in fact, one wonders how else it could be read! But surely when cedar-clad mountains "skip like a calf," we are again in the presence of a figure of speech which should be savored to the fullest extent, but which should not be interpreted with entire literalness.

The distinction between prose and poetry is not an easy one to make, for there is highly poetic prose and horribly pedestrian poetry. Perhaps it is more accurate to say that the genuine gifts of the poet sometimes appear in writing that is prose in form, and that the worst characteristics of prose appear in the form of poetry. But the use of highly figuratively language is one distinguishing feature of all good poetry, and the intelligent reader accepts it and interprets accordingly.

What, then, should one expect from the poetry of the Bible? So far as form is concerned, the parallelism which finds expression in the typical Hebrew couplet, with the repetition which is inherent in this form. In addition, all the characteristics of good poetry anywhere, but in particular the figurative language which comes naturally because the poet is speaking about something which concerns him vitally and which he is eager to convey not to the mind alone, but to the heart of his listener. Such poetry makes demands of its readers, but it offers rich rewards to those who come to it with a readiness to enjoy.

SWORDS INTO PLOWSHARES

Frances Fenner

ATTENTION was focused on a giant two-way switch on the platform. The speaker's words matched his actions as he said: "This switch is a symbol of the great dilemma of our times. I throw it now to the side of the peaceful atom . . . They shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks . . .' " As the prophetic words of Isaiah throbbed in the air, a giant light-bulb glowed, cameras flashed, newsreels ground, and ten thousand kilowatts of electric power surged into the waiting lines to be carried to homes, farms and industries in the area.

The gauges on the great control panel swung to life as the turbine generator hummed to its task of converting steam into commercial electric power.

Inside the huge steel sphere in the background lay the prototype of a deadly monster, the land-based test equipment of the submarine, Seawolf. When the nuclear reactor to power the atom sub produced more heat and steam than the propulsion equipment required, the by-product waste steam was piped to a turbine generator installed by General Electric Company to demonstrate the possibility of producing electricity by atomic power.

Hamburgers sizzle in skillet heated by first commercial atomic power distributed in America. Enough electricity to light and power a city of 25,000 was produced from by-product steam heated by a prototype reactor based in the huge sphere in the background

General Electric Company

Arrangements with the Niagara Mowhawk Power Corporation turned this electricity into utility lines to light and heat civilian outlets. This event, ten short years after the blasts of Alamogordo, Hiroshima and Nagasaki, is of great significance in raising the standards of living for the people of the world.

Not only in supplementing our own natural and diminishing resources, but also for developing the high-cost power areas where falling water or fuel is scarce in many parts of the world, now the atom may be directed to this limitless task.

The road ahead to peace and abundance is still long and hard. Many difficulties of production, distribution, and consumption remain to be resolved.

The stockpile of nuclear weapons still looms on the horizon, threatening the extinction of physical, social and moral institutions of mankind. But that very stockpile can be converted to the power for peace for which the world is waiting.

The atom, in and of itself, is neither good or evil. Its power for blessing or destruction lies in the minds and hearts of those in whose hands it is held. The ingenuity of man has devised a harness for a great, wild force of nature. It is incredible to doubt that man, created in the image of his Creator, is incapable of constructing the necessary social and political institutions where man and nations may work together in building a world of peace and plenty.

The forces of nature are ours to command. First we must govern ourselves, that the prophecy of Micah may be further fulfilled, that "Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, Neither shall they learn war any more.

but they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig tree, and none shall make them afraid."

KEEPING RESOLUTIONS

Leland A. Nelson

RESOLUTIONS are the order of the day. Resolutions have a great deal to do with the progress we make in life, both in initiating progress and checking it along the way. They should never be made hastily or discarded carelessly. Nor should too many be made at one time; it is easier to achieve three or four than fifteen or sixteen. Some that will be helpful for us to make this year include: doing more for others, developing more patience and understanding with our children, families, friends and neighbors (who is my neighbor?), determining to find what is right with others rather than what is wrong, taking more time for Bible reading and cultivating the art of prayer.

Unfortunately, most resolutions are soon broken or forgotten. This can be helped if one of our resolutions for this year would be to review the rest each morning and evening. As for breaking them, forgiveness makes it possible to begin again. Very often we attempt to do for ourselves something that only God can do for us. There are many things which we must do for ourselves, and God never violates our human rights by stepping in to do these for us. There are other things which we cannot do for ourselves, and God is ever seeking to accomplish them in our lives. However, he cannot until we cease trying to do for ourselves what he alone can do for us.

Every real accomplishment has first been a high resolve in someone's mind. But resolutions, as good and as necessary as they are, will never be enough. Something more is needed. The road to hell is paved with good intentions, and many resolutions turn out to be only good intentions. While it is good for us to make resolutions, it will be better for us to see what we can do to keep them. The best thing we can do is to recognize that most of us need a revolution more than a resolution to make our lives what they ought to be.

Resolutions are produced out of the imagination, but a changed habit and a better life take more than the power of a creative imagination. A revolution involves a change in loyalty and authority. Dominated as most of us are by selfishness, we need to experience a revolution which will change our basic concepts, our loyalty and the authority of our lives. Such a revolution does and can take place whenever God is recognized as being superior to self in terms of sustaining and directing our daily lives. Whenever self abdicates in favor of God, then one becomes "a new person in Christ Jesus. Old things are passed away and all things become new."

One then possesses this mind which was also in Christ Jesus and reveals a supreme loyalty to God. "We must obey God rather than man." This is the basic authority of life that removes every cause of fear, uncertainty and insecurity. "I am able for all things through Christ who is the strength of my life."

Resolutions are the order of the day. This is good, but do not confuse them with the best. A revolution will be needed if our resolutions are not to become mere good intentions.

Sending Our Spiritual Roots Deeper

Then the Week of Prayer is a time for disciplined intercession. The Week of Prayer summons every Christian to gather compassionately the world to his heart and upbear it tenderly, purposefully and creatively to the heart of God. Men's hearts grow faint and afraid, unless they are held in the orbit of divine love by some prayer. The most arduous work in human experience is vigorous, concrete, personal prayer for others. The making of life a lifelong conversation, communion and co-operation with God in behalf of others—their deliverance from evil, the heightening of the good in their lives—is the supreme purpose of living. Christlike out-pouring of soul for God's will to be done in others is the most decisive action in which one may engage. It costs more blood, sweat and tears than any other effort, service or ministry. Do Christians believe this? I fear not. And so the world languishes in its chaos and peril.

A week set aside to establish in one's life a conscious and continuous intercession for souls would open many closed doors to God. A week for getting the world that God has in his heart into our hearts is really the one hope of peace for the race. A week to take on the discipline of surrounding others daily with loving influences and with God carries the promise of shaking the kingdom of evil to its foundation.

Make your list of souls whom you will personally and regularly lift into God's presence for his correction, cleansing, strengthening and blessing. Let your prayer carry you around the world and encircle every heart. Begin with those near you — your family, the local church, the community, those at your place of work, friends, etc. Every day hold a dozen or more of these warmly and devotedly in God's healing light. Let the circle grow larger— district leaders, Brotherhood leaders, leaders of the nations. Prayer for others in an immeasurable labor, an exacting discipline. As we love people into the heart of God, God creatively and redeemingly works his way into their lives. Is not this phase of unceasing prayer a continent of life in which I have scarcely entered? We cannot legislate people into better life, but they can be prayed into fuller life.

Finally, the Week of Prayer is a time for disciplined co-operation with God. Time is the grace of God given us to make a life, to be a channel of his life to others. For it is by prayer that man reaches God and God enters into man's life, and through man's life to our broken humanity. Time for us is meant to be a thread of continuous communion and co-operation with God. Vital religion is always expressed in such prayer. While the heart of personal religion is prayer, the soul of prayer is obedience to God. Did our prayer become the hands and feet of God to men?

Prayer moves through adoration, penitence into mission, act, deed, sacrifice. Prayer that never gets beyond the verbal or mental stage is unreal and stillborn. The ultimate test of our communion with God is whether we communicate God. St. John of the cross, once said, "When the evening of life comes, you will be judged on love." The life of disciplined prayer becomes the life of love. And that life of love deepens our praying. Prayer feeds the flame of love or it dies. And love verifies and vitalizes prayer, or it becomes empty and unreal. So "men ought always to pray . . . Thy kingdom come."

The Spirit of God sends us forth from our little chapels of prayer into the wide world to make it the temple of prayer and of God's presence. Recently I looked upon a range of mountains. The foothills up almost to the top were blanketed with fog; only a narrow line at the top was visible. I wondered about its meaning for my life. The thought was given me that you could not get to the top of those mountains unless you go by way of the foothills and through the blanket of fog. That meant a strenuous climb. Such is prayer! Life must become prayer and prayer must become life. This means struggling up the mountainside and through clouds of dense fog. However, only by this route of discipline are life's spiritual roots sent deeper.

Quakers Reaffirm Opposition to Capital Punishment

Quakers from five continents went on record as reaffirming the Friends' historic opposition to capital punishment anywhere in the world. Their opposition is believed to be the first official stand on the question by the world-wide body. It will take the form of a "minute" to the Yearly Meetings suggesting that they also reaffirm the Quaker position. James F. Walker, secretary of the committee's American section, said, "We believe no one has the right to take life but God. There is always a chance of the miscarriage of justice. Besides, the soul of a man condemned to death might be reclaimed."

KINGDOM GLEANINGS

A $750,000 fund for the initial financing of thirty new churches was authorized by the Board of National Missions of the Evangelical and Reformed church. The money is to be spent over a three-year period.

Nearly $3,600,000 of the $6,000,000 pledged by member churches of the American Baptist Convention during the denomination's year-long "Churches for New Frontiers" drive already has been paid in, Dr. Ralph M. Johnson, director of the campaign, reported to the Convention's Council on Missionary Co-operation.

Radio Prague and Radio Warsaw agreed to broadcast a special Christmas program of the International Lutheran Hour. The American religious programs were the first aired in the two countries since World War II. Prague and Warsaw agreed to the broadcasts after being assured that they would not be political.

Two new collection depots have been opened by the World Relief Commission of the National Association of Evangelicals. This organization will use the Modesto and Nappanee centers which are operated in co-operation with the Brethren Service Commission. The World Relief Commission also maintains a depot in New York City.

A record budget of $4,800,000 was adopted for 1956 by the Board of American Missions of the United Lutheran Church. The budget provides more than $2,700,000 for mission operations, including more than $1,000,000 in salary aid to 700 younger congregations. It also allocates a little more than $2,000,000 for church extension loans.

An All-Africa Lutheran Conference held in Tanganyika was told repeatedly that the spread of Islam threatens the future of that continent. Some 150 delegates represented the nearly one million Lutherans of Africa and the Danish, Finnish, Icelandic, German, Norwegian, Swedish and American missionaries serving them.

Shortly after the beginning of the new year, churches in greater Cleveland expect to start a peace offensive. Seeking to make the voice of the church heard in national affairs, the churches will launch a three-point program: (1) Help the churches get a clear view of the international situation; (2) seek to work co-operatively with the Council on World Affairs; (3) find ways to get the views of church people before their representatives in Congress.

D. Elton Trueblood, Quaker philosopher and writer, has resigned as chief of religious policy for the U.S. Information Agency. Dr. Trueblood plans to return to Earlham College, Richmond, Ind., on Jan. 1, to resume his post as chairman of the department of philosophy and religion. He has been on leave from the Quaker school since March 1954, when he accepted the government appointment. Dr. Trueblood is expected to be succeeded in the USIA by Dr. Ronald Bridges, president of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions of the Congregational Christian Church.

Sales of calendars with a religious motif now exceed the once favored "girlie" type, according to officials of Brown and Bigelow, one of the nation's largest calendar publishers. The company's output includes calendars of Protestant, Catholic and Jewish interests.

The creation of a $240,000 construction loan fund by the Protestant Episcopal church has been announced in New York. Loans ranging from $10,000 to $25,000 will be made to dioceses or districts of the church for construction work in parishes and missions against pledges held by the individual congregations. This will permit construction to begin immediately instead of waiting for pledges to be collected.

A new 662-page edition of the New Testament has been issued by the home mission department of the Orthodox Church in Greece. The text used was approved by the Holy Synod of the Ecumenical Patriarchate at Istanbul and accepted by the Greek Orthodox Church. Work on a new version of the Bible in modern Greek is going forward under the direction of a committee of professors at the University of Athens theological school.

Protestant, Roman Catholic and Jewish institutions in the United States have received more than $200,000,000 in bequests over the past ten years. This estimate was given by T. K. Thompson, executive director of the National Council of Churches' department of stewardship and benevolence, at a conference on "Remember the Church in Your Will." He said that more than $100,000,000 went to Protestant churches and institutions. Harl Russell was chairman of the national conference.

Baptist leaders of four national Conventions have agreed to conduct a vast united evangelism crusade from 1959 to 1964. They met recently in Chicago with evangelism experts at a strategy conference to outline tentative plans. Presidents of the Southern Baptist Convention, the National Baptist Convention U.S.A., the American Baptist Convention and the North American Baptist General Conference were in attendance. The four groups represent about fourteen and one half million churchgoers in the United States.

Three hundred eighty-four church-related colleges and universities received nearly a hundred million dollars from the Ford Foundation to help increase teachers' salaries. According to the terms of the gift the sum received by each college is to be invested and the interest applied to salaries for a period of ten years; at that time the money may be used in any way the college may wish. Brethren colleges benefited as follows: Bridgewater, $91,700; Juniata, $138,600; Elizabethtown, $54,900; La Verne, $60,500; McPherson, $73,000; Manchester, $143,000. Three thousand five hundred voluntary nonprofit hospitals received $200,000,000 from the Foundation. Bethany Hospital in Chicago, Ill., received $23,200.

The most recent aspect of the ten-year development program is the organization of the Gibble fund-raising campaign for $70,000 to be used in adding a west wing to the science buidlding. The present Gibble Science Building was erected in 1927 for a student body one-fourth the size of the current group. Blueprints for the proposed addition are awaiting the approval of the board of trustees. The Gibble study and planning committee for this campaign includes Christ W. Gibble, Manheim, chairman; S. Clyde Weaver, Lancaster; Rufus K. Eby, Palmyra; Harry L. Gibble, Harrisburg, Henry Gibble, Lititz; and Robert S. Young, Hershey, secretary.

Prof. Wilhelm Reuning, department of history, has completed all the requirements for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. His doctrinal dissertation, The History of Article VII of the Triple Alliance, 1875-1915, is a study in Austro-Italian relations in the Western Balkans and the Adriatic. Eventually Prof. Reuning hopes to complete the study up to and including the Trieste problem. The degree will be conferred in February, when he will be graduated "with distinction" from the University of Pennsylvania.

Approximately 1,300 people attended the presentation of Handel's oratorio The Messiah by the combined college and Eastern District choruses. The 250-voice chorus was conducted by Prof. Nevin W. Fisher, head of the department of music. The project was planned by the Music and Worship Commission of the Eastern District and the college.

The district CBYF meeting, followed the singing of the oratorio on Dec. 4. Approximately 300 young people attended a fellowship supper in the college gymnasium preceding the meeting. Dr Raymond Veh, youth director in the Evangelical United Brethren Church, spoke on Christ's Challenge to Today's Youth to 400 young people.

Last year's student publications, the Conestogan (yearbook) and the Etownian (monthly newspaper) earned first-class ratings in the Associated Collegiate Press critical service. The Conestogan was edited by Hazel Crankshaw of Maytown, and the Etowian by Loretta Kline of Hanover. Both publications in earning the award were continuing records set by staffs in former years.

Prof. Robert Byerly, head of the department of religion, is teaching a course in The Gospel of John in the Greater Harrisburg interdenominational leadership training school. He is teaching a similar course in the Church of the Brethren leadership training school meeting in the Second church, York.

Student deputation groups have been serving the churches of Eastern and Southern Pennsylvania in worship programs. Their schedule will continue until late spring.

On Jan. 9-12 President A. C. Baugher will attend the annual meeting of the Association of American Colleges in St. Louis. The Commission on Higher Education of the Church of the Brethren will hold its annual meeting on Jan. 9. A new feature of this annual session will be the joint dinner conference of the presidents of colleges of these denominations: Church of the Brethren, Brethren, Evangelical United Brethren, Mennonite, Brethren in Christ, Moravian, Reformed Presbyterian in the United States, and others. They will consider the merits of the joint employment of a secretary of Christian higher education.

RECESSION?

Owen Jander

ONE chief characteristic of Brethren Service in Europe during the past ten years has been its adaptability. Adaptability has been a must, for we have been working in a drastically changing society—one which has been advancing by leaps and bounds from a state of postwar chaos to one of comparative economic stability. In countless situations where Brethren Service formerly was relieving dire need, conditions have so improved that we have felt justified in withdrawing our help. Not only in Brethren Service has this been the case. Cut backs in assistance programs have become quite general. American aid to Europe is now centered almost exclusively in industrial fields. Big-scale food and clothing distributions have decreased. Government support of student exchange programs has been cut back to a small fraction of what it was through the period of 1949 to 1953.

The pattern of cutting back has been repeated so often, unfortunately, that there are some who have concluded that there simply is no more need in Europe today.

Nothing could be farther from the truth. Any member of the Brethren Service program will quickly testify that bitter need is still to be found everywhere in Europe. To find it, one need only scratch a bit under the glistening surface of postwar reconstruction. The appearance of prosperity is just as deceptive as it is impressive. The American tourist who returns from Europe, especially Germany, and reports only the well-filled shop windows and splendid facades of reconstructed cities failed to see, or perhaps turned his back on, the less pleasant side of the true situation.

What is the less attractive side? For the answer, ask Peggy van Asselt about conditions in a German children's hospital. Ask Walt Moyer about poverty among resettled refugees in West Germany. Ask Carl Bross and Lorene Clark about the continuing stream of refugees from East Germany. Ask David Greer about the need in the orthopedic clinic where he has worked this last year. Or ask Marvin Blickenstaff about the frustrated efforts of displaced persons who want to immigrate to the security and freedom of America. Robert Roller could tell you the plight of refugees in Berlin who are not granted "legal" status. Leon Kline knows the story of refugees and villagers of the rocky hillsides of northwestern Greece. Jan Thompson knows the situation of young people in Vienna, where low wages demand that some necessities be secured at the sacrifice of other things which we consider just as necessary.

No more need in Europe? To the contrary, the conditions now present a greater challenge than ever before. Before, the need was general — even the strong were beaten down just after the war. The strong, of course, have managed to get on their feet again by now; they don't require help any more. The people who need the help now are the weaker folk, the ones who have not had the means, strength or opportunity to rise from the misery which the war brought upon them.

There was no problem in finding the need in 1945—everybody in Europe was in need. Now the need is in the corners and recesses of society. Now we are challenged with the more difficult task of getting at the not-so-obvious cases of need. This is no time for relaxing efforts! His kingdom will never come if we who would help permit ourselves to notice only the surface prosperity about us.

REFUGEE RESETTLEMENT NOTES

IS THERE STILL A NEED to be concerned about the refugees in the world? We hear glowing reports of the economic conditions in some of the European countries. Although the heavy flow of refugees into West Berlin was a topic of major news emphasis over a year ago, we do not read much about such a situation at the present time. However, it is estimated that during the month of September 18,500 refugees crossed from East to West Berlin to swell the already overcrowded refugee camps. The problem of the refugee remains.

Although the flow of refugees from the camps is not large enough, their resettlement elsewhere partly helps to alleviate the tremendous problem. The General Langfitt docked in New York the last week of October with 1,200 refugees. Five of these families are Brethren-sponsored. A total of ten refugee families came to the States under sponsorship of Brethren Service during October; this compares to eight in September.

One of the recently arrived families writes, "We have arrived here all right and we made already friends. We have also work and we like it here very much, and we are very glad that we came. We have also found a church which we visit and where our children are attending the Sunday school. Best thanks once more for everything. With kind regards, Jakob Reister."

These Are THE FACTS

Marlo Oltman

YOUTH Working Together for the Edifying of the World" was the theme of the nine work camps organized by Brethren Service in Germany and Austria during the summer of 1955. These international work camps constitute a visable expression of Brethren belief in pacifism and reconciliation of all men. This program seeks to bring together from all countries of the world youth who are willing to cooperate and to work toward building a better world on the principles taught by Christ. Every attempt is made to hold the camp on a high spiritual level and to knit the campers into a close fellowship.

This past summer two five-week camps were held at the orthopedic hospital and clinic near Hessisch-Lichtenau, Germany. The work project required unskilled, hard physical labor. The major effort was given to the building of a recreation area for the patients and apprentices. A clinic program was carried on among the children in the hospital. Several campers instructed them in craft work, led music, told stories and gave some of the companionship that bedfast children need.

Just as important as the work was the exchange of cultural backgrounds and experiences among the campers. Living as one big family for five weeks gave opportunity for exchange of ideas on subjects varying from menu planning to complex social and theological problems. Finland, Sweden, Holland, Austria, Spain, Indonesia, Greece, Germany (East and West) and the United States were the nations represented in the work camps; three Brethren volunteers were responsible for the guidance of the camp program.

These are the facts of attempts at building a better world. However, a story like this cannot be told adequately with words and facts. It must be experienced to be realized completely. A work camp is a small-scale example of mankind, an illustration of what the world might be if man would let his higher motives dominate his less noble desires. By cultivating the spirit and demonstrating it in everyday living we challenge others. When all men strive to live the best kind of life they know, we will find ourselves in a transformed world. Let us work and pray for that day.

News Notes From Germany

Walton Moyer, Brethren volunteer from Indian Creek, Pa., and Joanne Nesler, volunteer from Elgin, Ill., report the arrival of 42,789 pounds of food, clothing and shoes for the material aid program and the Brethren House in Kassel. The shipment arrived in Kassel during the first week of November.

The shipment consists of ten tons of food, ten tons of clothing and thirty bags of shoes. Most of the food is being used for the Brethren Service volunteer personnel who are working in the various programs. The clothing is being given to German welfare organizations and directly to refugee camps and orphanages.

One load of the clothing and some of the food was taken immediately to Volkmarsen refugee camp which was reopened for the immediate acceptance of refugees who are presently fleeing to the West. More than 32,000 refugees arrived in Berlin in October; 180 of them have been processed, given West German citizenship and flown to the West Zone. Many of them fled with no more clothing than they could wear in order not to raise the suspicion of their police.

Max Snider, volunteer from Bradford, Ohio, working in Heifer Project Inc., recently returned from a trip of accompanying heifers to Austria and visiting more heifers there under the new project plan in that country. LeRoy Burdick, volunteer from Connecticut who is representing the heifer project in Austria, with Jan Thompson, who is a volunteer from West Milton, Ohio, presently leader of the work in Vienna, and Max visited several Southern Ohio heifers to report to the home people.

WHERE CAN I FILL A NEED ?

Volunteer Joanne Nesler of Elgin, Ill., serving in the Kassel material aid department, reports: "Refugee women are using our fifteen sewing rooms in learning to sew and finish garments for members of their immediate families. This is a self-help project. The results of labor there have filled both a physical and spiritual need in many families." Needed are sewing kits and yardage as indicated on pages 3 and 6 of the Material Aid Handbook. Your gifts of sewing materials should be sent to the Brethren Service center in your area.

For copies of the Material Aid Handbook or for additional information concerning sewing materials and kits, write to the Director of Material Aid, Brethren Service Center, New Windsor, Md.

Lifting Our Sights in Women's Work

Anna M. Warstler
Director of Women's Work

QUOTING Norman J. Baugher in Women and the Total Church Program we discover that "Women's Work has had long history in the Church of the Brethren. In a fellowship where love feast preparations and assisting applicants for baptism by trine immersion have been central in our emphasis, women have had an important work. Around 1885 Women's Work took the form of an organization—its major interest was in supporting missions. This was the church's outreach program.

"Later mother and daughter groups organized. Still later these groups took on programs of Bible study, peace and temperance. From 1930 these six interests were included as part of Women's Work: missions, Bible study, temperance, aid work, mother and daughter, and peace. In 1947 the women at Orlando, Fla., voted to include the total church program within Women's Work interests, thus leading to the idea of a national project for the Brotherhood Fund of $50,000." Since that time a project of $55,000 has been accepted and has been generously oversubscribed each year.

For a number of years there have been some rather new trends evolving within the whole framework of Women's Work. These lie within relationships to the total program of the church and in an integration of the various programs of the local church. "Sentiment is growing among women to get behind the total program of the church. This has local implications, as well as national ones. Women's Work presidents are being asked to sit with the church cabinet. Women are serving on trustee boards, finance committees and building committees. Their funds are being divided in ways to help undergird a needy local program as well as service calls around the world. Both Men's and Women's Work, through their National Councils have agreed to encourage increasing co-operative projects and activities."—Manual for Women's Work Groups. The men and women of the local church are merging more and more into an adult department. The Adult Council in the local church is made up of all who work with adults: Sunday-school teachers, class officers, young adult leaders, Men's Work and Women's Work officers.

This development in Women's Work as outlined above is good and sound. Very few would deny that and would want to go back to the "good old days." Most Brethren women, we believe, are challenged by the words of the poet when he said, "To serve the present age, my calling to fulfill, O may it all my powers engage to do my Master's will."

By and large women do see that a broader view of the total program of the church is wholesome, that an integration of cause and effort with the men and other age groups of the church make for more efficiency and saving of time in this fast world when one seems forever on the "go" and so many problems loom constantly upon the horizon.

Most women also appreciate the value of losing a certain identity in these days in a large program, for after all so many interests are common. Many will likewise agree to an all-inclusive aim which is expressed in the Manual for Women's Work Groups: "The total Women's Work program aims to include, conserve and develop the talents and interests of every woman in the congregation. It encourages the women to co-operate with the local church cabinet or governing group. It attempts to create a sense of responsibility toward the home, the church, the community, the nation and the world, which expresses itself in active Christian service. Through worship and personal devotion, living, education, fellowship and service, these aims are achieved."

After having acceded to the general tone of the above philosophy, there looms up no doubt a large question mark in the hearts of many women. It might be expressed something like this—is there then no dis-

Today Women's Work groups are encouraged to promote the total program of the church. As the local cabinet plans activities for the year it is advisable for them to seek the pastor's counsel tinctive service a woman can render or is to render in this so-called "new day"? Is she to lose her identity for the sake of the whole? This is an honest question on the part of many Brethren women, women who yet tend to move cautiously and with trepidation in the face of change. This is true Brethrenism. It is to this great group that the writer would address herself. Sisters, in these days we are called to serve, to lift our sights to more glorious horizons.

Some years ago a group of us made a most rigorous effort to catch the coveted view of Mt. Everest in the majestic Himalayas of the Asian continent. We knew it would be only the snow-capped peak of it, for we were far, far away from even the range of mountains which nestled away this famous peak. But just to be able to lift our sights to his horizon! And what a glorious glimpse of the eternal snows it was —but just for a moment, then the clouds rolled over and for all practical purposes we were thrown back into our usual level of horizons, even though thousands of feet above sea level. In due time we all were back in a number of ways before the accustomed horizons of our villages.

One time a small child in America saw another horizon. He said to his mother looking at the sinking sun, "Mother, the sun is going down here but it is coming up in India; it is morning there." Yes, even a young child can be stimulated by a new sight in this thinking.

Goals for Today's Women

Now we would like to think about some levels to which we as women could well lift our sights as we think of a special contribution we might make in this generation and day in which we have been called to live and to serve.

First, Bro. Baugher says in Women and the Total Church Program that "Women's Work might as well find a new role in helping the whole church to revitalize our traditional interest in home and family life. This is probably more vital to the health of both the church and society than we think.

"I firmly believe someone must lead a crusade to rediscover the Christian vocation of homemaking. There is something unsound about women needing status, activity and expression and then finding it outside the home to the neglect of home and children. I am aware this is a terrificly complex problem. And Mirra Komarovsky has observed that 'what defeats our appeal to women to find dignity in domesticity is the fact that our society is saturated with other values.' "

Second, women can also be a vital influence in the life of the church in the area of evangelism. Statistics reveal to us that the population of America is increasing by leaps and bounds, but our own church membership is not increasing accordingly. In relation to this problem Bro. Harley Stump addressed a paper to the women of Northern California assembled in district conference saying, "Let us examine our interests. How many homes have we visited during the past year in the interest of the great commission? How many doors to hearts and souls have we helped open to the love and ministry of Jesus? Do we care that there are those about us who know not the Christ warmly, devotedly, sacrificially, intimately? Women, our task is before us, our ministry and influence is sorely needed in the work of evangelism. Let us stop sweeping up pennies in the street and start gathering treasures from heaven."

For a reasonable two-year goal in this area Bro. Stump in his article has suggested that "the church with one hundred members should baptize twenty-five; the church with 300 members, about seventy-five persons and the church with 500 members about 125 persons." We are not going to baptize them just to increase the ranks of our membership; we are going to baptize them because we have a Savior that we would like to share with them. In fact, he has commissioned us to go and make disciples of all men. We are going to baptize them because our Christian experience has given new meanings and new hopes to our living. We are going to baptize them because God loves them, because they are prodigal sons who have lost their friendship and the Father longs to welcome them back home. Sisters, could we not find in this area or part of the program of the church, a great field of service in these days?

A third area in which women may well serve today is in the stewardship life of the church. Again may we look at the paper written by Bro. Stump, who is speaking directly to women. "Since women have been spending so much time laboring in fund-raising activities, this aspect of the church certainly must be considered. It is a part of the church program, but the Creator never planned that it should occupy such a large portion of the church's thinking and program. The stewardship of life simply means the committed life; the life that is committed to God shares out of its produce, regularly and systematically just as the individual expects God to share the bountifulness of grace regularly and systematically. This does not mean, however, that the women do not have a task; they do have. They have a gigantic task of training or influencing the church toward the Christian point of stewardship."

In the near future, we will consider additional goals.

THE LIBRARY LISTENING POST

CHURCH librarians, please make a New Year's resolution to share at least one library incident with others in the Brotherhood. Things that would be of interest include: how to promote or advertise your books; how to get people to read the books; what library hours prove most satisfactory; human interest stories relating true experiences with books or their messages; other activities, such as story hours, provided by the church library; how library resources are used to enrich church programs.

Every board of Christian education ought to give serious consideration to the establishment of a church library if the church does not have one. Churches which do have libraries could well consider ways of improving their services.

Church libraries should contain books that will be helpful to teachers, program planners and for all who desire to grow through reading.

The Christian Education Commission has the following free guidance materials for the beginning librarian: Resources to Aid in the Ministry of the Church Library; Minimum Essentials for a Usable Library; Classification System for Church Libraries; Subject Headings for Church Libraries; Recommended Books for Your Church Library; and Your Church Library (25c).

Available playlets to stimulate interest and enthusiasm are: A Right Way and a Wrong Way to Start a Church Library; A Doorway to Knowledge; and Micky.

Khergam

The community felt a great loss last year when the Khergam mission school was refused recognition by the government and had to be closed. However, it was decided to continue hostels for boys and girls and send them to the government school near by. The numbers were reduced, but during the year it was found that the hostels were meeting a need. This year (the school begins in June) we have more in both boys' and girls' hostels. The girls are all of Christian background, but many of the boys are from non-Christian homes. They attend school, worship with us daily and receive religious instruction. Besides this they do much of the work on the school farm which provides a considerable part of their food.

The new centers for evangelistic and service work at Dharampur, Wad and Khudvel are beginning to function with an enthusiastic Christian leader living in each of the villages. Dharampur, where no Christian preaching or teaching has been done before, has made an especially encouraging start.—Rachel Zigler.

Ahwa

During the past two months there has been a scourge of poisonous snakes in the Dangs. One boarding school girl was bitten by a cobra. She was rushed to the near-by government hospital. Our extra supply of antisnake serum came in handy.

Recently we started a class for baptismal candidates. It will meet each Wednesday night. On the first night, ten young people were present. The number will, no doubt, increase as Christmas approaches.

The new government hospital, costing around $75,000, will soon be officially opened. This will decrease our dispensary work and provide better medical care for the people of our district.

The young people of Ahwa are taking a very active part in the church program. Last Sunday more than one hundred young people were present in the worship service.

Because of sufficient rains our people will harvest excellent crops this year. This will be quite a contrast to the year 1952, a partial famine year in the Dangs.—Ernest M. Shull.

Vyara

It is our view that we need to sense the mind, temperament and needs of the church in India these days and to redouble efforts at working through the church. With the closing of the village schools there have been many adjustments to make. The Christians in this area have a great desire to have the Vyara station primary school for fifth, sixth, and seventh grades reopened.

A Young Laymen's Institute was held for six days with 100 attending. Philemonbhai of Bulsar and local leaders helped to put it across. "Christ the Same, Yesterday, Today, and Forever" was the theme of the institute. (A full report will appear in a later issue of the Gospel Messenger.)—Ruth Brooks.

Anklesvar

The Rural Service Center program has changed. Rather than having workers scattered all over Gujarat they are now opening centers within a radius of thirty miles of Anklesvar. Nine workers began work on October 1. This will make closer supervision and giving of help on the spot possible.

Former teachers of our village schools have been rehired by government to run the same schools they had last year, a gesture much appreciated. Nine church leaders, two pastors and seven evangelists, working in the Anklesvar district met at Anklesvar for a week's institute in October. — Kathryn Kiracofe.

Umalla

After the heavy rains were over we spent several days and nights in each of three localities. One trip was to Taropa, where we tried to visit and hold a short prayer service in every home in which there are Christians. During this visit we stressed maintaining full fellowship with the Christian church. Emphasis was laid on the removal of the heavy anklets worn by the women from childhood. The Taropa people have built a school building for themselves. Our two former teachers, Samuel Nagarji and his wife, teach there still. Two non-Christian boys have been placed there as teachers, also.

There has been a bumper corn crop this year. All crops look fine except cotton on flat lands where it got too much moisture.—Joy Fasnacht.

Fiftieth Anniversary for India Missionary Association

Harlan J. Brooks
Vyara, India

THE interdenominational missionaries' association of the Gujarat-Kathiawar area of Bombay State met recently at Anand, India. It was the occasion for celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of the organization.

In the early years of India missions there was little framework for interdenominational co-operation. The Irish Presbyterians and American Methodists had begun their work earlier than the Church of the Brethren. Hence, the first Brethren gained much help from friendly neighbors. Problems and difficulties which were common to all naturally tended to draw missionaries together in co-operation while still maintaining denominational characteristics. The Wesleyans, the Christian Missionary Alliance and the Salvation Army joined in the fellowship.

These denominations agreed to respect denominational lines and responsibilities. There was plenty of space in which to share Christ. Approaching non-Christians in a non-Christian culture seemed a job too big for any one denomination. Shepherding first-generation Christians was somewhat different from that required for second-generation Christians. Even the helping of young Christians to find suitable life companions was one of numerous other engaging issues calling for interdenominational co-operation.

New missionaries had to learn the Gujarati language. This commonly felt need brought them together in language study. Through the years an interdenominational language board has arranged the study course and examinations.

Christian literature and hymnal preparation were additional projects undertaken together.

These, and other projects, initiated and promoted by the inter-mission body were gradually taken over by the Indian churches. They have formed their own interdenominational regional conferences, committees and organs designed to effect a united front in a non-Christian culture.

For some years now, the interdenominational missionary conference has become a fellowshipping body. This year, George Wilson, an Irish Presbyterian missionary for over fifty years, spoke and drew freely and appreciatively from J. M. Blough's brief history of this body.

John Sadiq, an Indian secretary of the National Christian Council of India, spoke of the abiding spiritual contributions made by missionaries and foreign boards to the life of India. He expressed the hope that the way would remain open whereby missionaries, spiritually conditioned to work with and through the Indian church, would be able to continue for a long time their work in India.

Out of the Mailbag

William R. Bhagat, principal of Brethren Vocational Training College in India, writes: "You will be glad to know that the college work is progressing well. The new year began on the 13th of June and the number of students is ever increasing. We have eighty pupil-teachers in the college of which twenty-five are Brethren, ten Irish Presbyterian, eight Methodist, two Alliance and one Church Missionary Society. There are about eight Muslims and the rest Hindus. The government wants to assign an increasing number of students here but owing to the shortage of space we are not able to take more of their teachers.

"Similarly the practicing school (school in which student teachers do practice teaching) also has about 250 students of whom nearly half are Christian students. About 200 students live in the hostel here. The rooms in the hostel as well as in the college remain the same while the number of pupils is increasing year after year. The church is growing in number and size, and there is a bigger pressure on us here. We need to expand the hostel accommodations if we want to help our children get an education. Most of the other churches in Gujarat are expanding their educational facilities for their children and even planning to provide facilities for higher education here in India and abroad."

"Plans are being made to begin direct village work in medicine in the area around Bulsar. It is hoped that regular visits can be paid to key villages and dispensaries conducted and some instruction given in public health," writes Paul Hoover.

Broadfording Begins Pastoral Program

NO ONE knows exactly when the Broadfording church in Middle Maryland was built, but it is between ninety and a hundred years old. It was formerly a part of the Welsh Run congregation and one of four preaching points served by the free ministry of that day. Recent years, however, have seen the congregation served by a supplied ministry, under the direction of the resident elder, David R. Petre, who has admirably served in the community for nearly fifty years. An effort a few years ago to begin a part-time pastoral program did not prove satisfactory and the congregation was faced with one of the greatest challenges of its history.

The Broadfording church is about five miles from Hagerstown, is in one of the numerous growing population edges of the community, and has an opportunity, not only to serve its own people, but the many other homes which need a church.

Recognizing this opportunity and responsibility, the congregation decided in August 1954 to erect a parsonage and begin planning for a full-time pastoral program. A construction-finance committee was appointed with authority to solicit funds and to begin construction when two thirds of the needed funds were on hand. A solicitation was made of the membership and friends and by midwinter enough money had been contributed to start work.

Ground was broken on Feb. 16, 1955, and the various stages of construction proceeded in order. Numerous members of the congregation gave their full-time attention to the work as masons, carpenters, painters and helpers. Practically all of the labor was done without cost to the church. Only a few hundred dollars was spent for actual labor other than for the electrical and plumbing contracts.

The completed parsonage, costing slightly less than $12,000, is a one and one half story, brick building, containing eight rooms. It is located about one quarter mile from the church, overlooking the beautiful rural community of which it is a part. The finished building is now debt free and a two-car garage, recently finished, is practically paid for, too.

While the construction of a parsonage progressed, the pastoral board of the church was working too. By April 1, a contact had been made with a prospective pastor. Upon graduation from Bethany Bible Training School, he was able to visit with the church on June 5, which resulted in a call from the church.

The new parsonage was dedicated on July 10, with Bro. DeWitt L. Miller of Hagerstown as the speaker. On August 1, eleven months after the building committee had been appointed, Bro. J. Stanley Earhart and his family moved into the community to assume pastoral responsibility for the congregation.

The response to a pastoral program has justified the efforts of the congregation. Attendance in morning services has been from 30% to 55% higher than the corresponding Sundays of the preceding year. A recent preaching mission and evangelistic effort resulted in twenty-three baptisms. Plans are being laid for vigorous programs of nurture and growth through the Sunday school, midweek services, etc.

The Broadfording church with its 350 members is keenly aware of the responsibility and opportunities it has. And this congregation believes that other churches of our Brotherhood ought to take vigorous steps in the same direction.

The new parsonage of the Broadfording church, Middle Maryland, looks out over the rural countryside
